boundaries of a land district, and for the establishment of a land office in the State of Indiana;" and the bill from the Senate to establish an additional land office in the State of Illinois," passed through a Committee of the Whole. The latter bill was, on motion of Mr. HARDIN, ordered to lie on the table, but was afterwards taken up, and finally passed.

Mr. RHEA moved also to lay the former on the table, which motion being rejected, the question was stated on ordering the bill to a third reading; and debate arising thereon, the previous question was required by Mr. TAYLOR, and taken, and the bill finally passed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th of May, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House the letter of Jonathan Russell, Esq., referred to in his Message of the fourth instant, together with such communications as he may have received relative thereto, from any of the other Ministers of the United States who negotiated the Treaty of Ghent," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents called for by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 7, 1822.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, May 7, 1822.

The Secretary of State has the honor of transmitting to the President of the United States his remarks upon the paper deposited at the Department of State on the 22d of last month, by Jonathan Russell, late one of the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at the negotiation of Ghent, to be communicated to the House of Representatives, as the letter called for by their resolution of the 19th of that month; and the Secretary of State respectfully requests that the President would transmit to the House of Representatives these remarks, together with the above mentioned communication of Mr. Russell, on the renewal of the call therefor by the House.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Message and documents were ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, May 8.

The House met at six o'clock, according to order, and, it appearing that a quorum was not present, and it being made known to the House that the Senate did not meet until ten o'clock to-day, a recess of this House was ordered until ten o'clock.

At ten o'clock the House re-assembled, and continued in session, with occasional recesses, until all the business which was transacted yesterday was put in form, and the necessary messages interchanged between the President and the two Houses.

In the course of the day, the following incidents took place:

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, delivered in the following report from the Committee of Ways and Means:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the President's Message of the 2d inst. communicating several letters from Mr. Bagot, Mr. Antrobust, and Mr. Canning, in which they remonstrate on the part of the British Government, against the duty imposed on rolled bar iron, as a violation of the convention made between the United States and Great Britain, Report. That the committee regret that the few days remaining of the session do not afford time sufficient to give the subject that consideration which its importance requires. They therefore decline to express any opinion on its merits, and recommend the subject to the early consideration of the House at the next session.

This report was read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. POINSETT, the Clerk of this House was authorized to purchase, for the use of the members, ten copies of the sixth volume of the Laws of the United States, published by Davis & Force of this city.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the reports of the Committee of Claims, on the cases of Stephen Mack and Shubael P. Conant, and of Henry B. Brevourt. Whereupon, it was ordered that the said reports be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of the representatives of Zachariah Schoonmaker; as also, the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the petition of Peter Mills. Whereupon, it was ordered that the said reports be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. COOK, yesterday, was taken up, read, and agreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, (Mr. TAYLOR being temporarily in the Chair,) it was Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable PHILIP P. BARBOUR, for the assiduity, promptitude, and ability, with which he has administered the duties of the Chair during the present session.

Mr. HILL and Mr. LITTLE were appointed to announce to the President that the House had got through their business, and were ready to adjourn.

The Committee having a little before three o'clock stated to the House, that the President had informed them he had no further communication to make—

Mr. Speaker BARBOUR rose and addressed the House as follows:

At the commencement of the present session, when I was unexpectedly called by you to the Chair, I expressed the profound sense of gratitude which I felt for that distinguished mark of your confidence; at the close of the session, I have to acknowledge a new and increased weight of obligation, arising from the resolution which you have this day adopted. I should not, under any circumstances, have been vain enough to suppose that I could have passed through the long and laborious session, which is just about to be terminated, without falling into some error; still less could I have hoped for it, under the consciousness which I felt of my inexperience in relation to the duties of my office; if, however, I have erred, I trust it has been in points not material; I know it has been unintentional; and the approbation which you have to-day expressed of my conduct affords to me a gratifying proof, that, whilst you have given me a generous credit for the purity of my motives, whilst you have, with a kind indulgence, overlooked my defects, you have done more than justice to my best efforts to merit your good opinion. The recollection of these things will long be cherished by me as a source of pleasure; it will add to a sense of duty, a new motive to endeavor, by every possible exertion, to acquit myself of the high responsibility of my office, in a manner satisfactory to you. At this moment of approaching separation, permit me to assure you of my friendship and good feelings to you all, and to express the sincere desire, that, upon retiring from the toils of legislation, you may have a safe and happy return to the bosoms of your respective families, and that, when you have arrived there, you may enjoy the happiness and peace which ought to belong to the domestic state.

The SPEAKER then adjourned the House until the first Monday in December next, the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress.

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECH.

[From the National Intelligencer, October 16, 1855.]

A RELIC OF THE LATE WILLIAM LOWNDES.—Of all the distinguished men who have passed periods of their lives in either House of Congress there is certainly no one, of any thing like equal ability, who has left fewer traces on the page of history, or on the records of Congress, than WILLIAM LOWNDES, the eminent Representative for several years of the State of South Carolina. Not that he was less honored and respected, as well for his elevated patriotism and his fine intellect, as for his high moral qualities and his social virtues, than any one of his contemporaries in public life. But that so few of his eloquent speeches are to be found on record is attributable, in part, to his unfeigned diffidence, which placed less than their true value upon his own exertions, and in part to an objection which he had, on principle, to the practice, then general, of writing out speeches for publication, either before or after the delivery.

A sketch, however, of one of the briefest of the speeches of this eminent statesman, (who but for his retiring modesty might, to our knowledge, have worn the highest honors in the gift of his Government,) we are now enabled to present to our readers, through the kindness of a friend, into whose possession it came by the death of a relative. Besides the rarity of this production, as an exception to Mr. L.'s rule to decline writing out his speeches, the subject to which it relates cannot fail to interest every reader who rightly appreciates the memory of PERRY, the renowned naval commander, whose victory on Lake Erie, during the war of 1812, gave safety to the exposed frontier of the country, and greatly contributed, with the subsequent events, to bring about an honorable and happy peace.

Endorsed in Mr. Senator SILSBEE'S handwriting, "SPEECH of Hon. W. LOWNDES, for the Relief of the Family of Commodore PERRY, written off by Mr. L. at my request." Session of 1820-'21.—Jan. 23-4.

Mr. Chairman: I could wish, but I dare not hope, that the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) by withdrawing his amendment, will afford to the Committee the opportunity of giving a direct vote on the bill which is before them. If the health of my friend from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had allowed him to explain his views to the Committee, I should have been entirely silent. As it is, I shall say but a few words.

We do not object to the law which defines the cases in which pensions may be given by the Executive Government, and limits their amount. It is right that there should be a general rule, and that prescribed by the law is a safe one. It is a law to the Executive Government. But it does not withdraw from Congress the power. It cannot supersede the duty of expressing our gratitude for signal services, and of providing (where the letter of the law does not do so) for the family of the man who lived and died for his country.

The gentleman from Kentucky says that Commodore Perry did not die of a wound. It was his last regret that he had not fallen on the quarter-deck of his own ship. But the disease which carried him off was one to which he could not have been exposed but in obedience to the orders of his Government. He died not only while he was in service, but, because he was in service. Shall we aggravate the irreparable loss of his family by leaving it in hopeless poverty? Gentlemen are unwilling to grant pensions. They are granted now. They fear, from the example of other nations, that we shall become profuse in our generosity. No Government has been lavish to the dead. Postpone the remuneration for the highest military services until the man who rendered them is no more, and the most suspicious economy may hug itself in confidence that the hour of dangerous extravagance has passed.

You will not say that our gratitude should end with the services of Commodore Perry—with his life? But, his services have not ended. We have still the inland seas which were recovered by his arms. His example lives; and if, at some period of future depression and dismay, we shall be told that single ships may annoy the commerce of our enemy, but that an assembled fleet would be a prize to a Power which it is wiser to elude than to resist, his example shall rebuke our weakness and enlighten our feeling. You will rally the desponding spirits of the country by his name. I am not willing to speak of the battle of Lake Erie. It is a theme for pride and emulation, and that temper is subdued in me now, by the condition of that man's family, to whom we owe the victory. But, though I cannot describe, never shall I forget the circumstances of that battle. Courage might have saved your fleet from capture, not from destruction. The highest praise of other men would have been to take refuge from captivity in honorable death. The battle was al- ready lost; and it was at a moment when the rarest union of skill and courage could not have effected a retreat, that the genius of Perry gave you a victory. You all remember the despondence which preceded that victory, the confidence which followed it. It gave a new, and, I trust, a permanent direction to the naval policy of this country. I know of no action of modern or of ancient times where success has resulted more undeniably from the personal conduct of the commander. Two of the greatest actions of our day have been decided by the arrival of an unexpected reinforcement.* But who will tell me of another commander, who, in the most desperate peril of his battle, left the command which he could not otherwise save, and brought back with him the reinforcement which saved his victory? The naval glory of the country is without spot. I make no invidious demonstration. I apply no prism to the ray to separate the different colors whose general character is light. But the Navy which has done so much for the nation feels how much has been done by the battle of Lake Erie for its character and its prospects. There is not a seaman whose homely meal would not be embittered by the reflection that the family of his old commander had been excluded from the bounty of his Government. If, Mr. Chairman, that commander had longer lived, if another war, if an Atlantic Navy—— But I must not pursue this course of observation. My mind is sufficiently filled with the recollection of what he was, without reflecting upon what he would have been. We have, gentlemen, the fullest proof that the objects of the proposed bounty are entirely destitute. The question is a simple one. Will you decide, by your votes, that the children of Commodore Perry shall be without education—his wife without a home?

SPAIN—DELIVERY OF THE FLORIDAS.

[Communicated with the President's Message, December 5, 1821]

Instructions to Colonel James G. Forbes.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 10, 1821.

SIR: The President of the United States, having occasion to employ a person to take to the Spanish Governor General of the island of Cuba the order from his Government for the delivery of the provinces of East and West Florida to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them, has selected you as the agent for that purpose, and a certificate to that effect from this Department will be delivered to you with this letter.

You will forthwith repair to New York, and there take passage in the United States sloop of war Hornet, Captain Read, who will be instructed to receive you, and to proceed as soon as possible to the Havana. The order to the Governor General of Cuba, together with a letter from the Spanish Minister, General Vives, to him, is committed to you, and you will deliver it to him in person upon your arrival. You will urge the immediate execution of it, and will offer to take charge yourself of the Governor General's order to the Governor of West Florida. Should he prefer to transmit this by an officer of his own appointment, Captain Read will be authorized to give him a passage with you in the ship to Pensacola. You will also concert with him the means of transmitting the order for the delivery of the province of East Florida to the Governor at St. Augustine. It has been represented that the archives and public documents stipulated to be delivered up by the treaty are at the Havana, and, if so, you will require that they should be delivered to you, and take them with you in the ship to Pensacola, where you will keep them in safe custody till the arrival of Major Gen. A. Jackson, who is appointed Governor of the whole of the territories ceded, and to whom you will deliver them over, or to his order, taking a suitable receipt or receipts for them, by duplicates, one of which you will transmit to this Department. On arriving at Pensacola, and communicating to the Governor the order from the Governor of Cuba, you will immediately give notice, by express, to General Jackson, who will be at Montpelier, in the vicinity of that place, that he may repair to it to receive possession; and you will then remain at Pensacola, giving information to this Department through the nearest mail (believed to be at Blakeley) of your proceedings. You will also communicate to this Department any information relating to the country which it may be useful for us to possess, and wait for such instructions as may be transmitted to you till the accomplishment of the objects of your mission.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars a day from the time of your departure from this place till your arrival at Pensacola; all your expenses on the passage are to be at your own charge; and from the time of your arrival at Pensacola the allowance will be six dollars a day till you receive notice that it is to cease. If you then conclude to return to New York, the allowance will be continued for a reasonable time, to admit of your return.

The papers herewith furnished you are—

1. A certificate of your appointment.
2. A commission authorizing you to demand and receive the archives.
3. The order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba, with a letter to him from the Spanish Minister here.
4. Six copies of the treaty, with the ratifications, to be used as you may find convenient.
5. A copy of the order to the Governor of Cuba.
6. A copy of the act of Congress for carrying the treaty into execution.

It is proper to apprise you that if, by any accident, you should be prevented from executing the service herewith assigned to you, Mr. G. L. Thompson has a commission for performing it in your stead. I am, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

JAMES G. FORBES, Esq.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.Certificate of appointment to Colonel Forbes.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting :

Whereas, by the second article of the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, concluded at Washington, on the 22d day of February, 1819, between these United States and His Catholic Majesty, it is stipulated as follows: "His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida, the adjacent islands dependent on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property; archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them."

And whereas the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his said Catholic Majesty at this place has delivered, to be transmitted to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, his said Majesty's royal order for the due execution of the said stipulation :

Now, therefore, I do hereby authorize and appoint James G. Forbes, a citizen of the United States, as agent and commissary of the United States, to deliver to the said Captain General and Governor the royal order aforesaid; to arrange and concert with him, conformably to the instructions herewith committed to the said James G. Forbes, the execution of the said stipulations, and to receive from the said Captain General and Governor, and from any and every person who may be possessed of the said archives and documents, all and every one of the same, and to dispose thereof in the manner prescribed by his instructions. And I do hereby request the said Captain General and Governor, and any and every person who may be in possession of any such archives and documents, duly authorized by or under the authority of His Catholic Majesty's Government, or otherwise, to deliver up the same to the said James G. Forbes, conformably to the above-recited stipulation of the said treaty. And a copy of this letter patent, certified by the said James G. Forbes, together with his receipt for the said archives and documents, shall be full and satisfactory proof of the fulfilment of the said stipulation, with respect to the archives and documents so by him received.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the said United States, at Washington, this 14th day [L. S.] of March, 1821, and in the forty-fifth year of the Independence of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President :

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,

Secretary of State.

Special commission to Colonel Forbes.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to James G. Forbes, of the State of New York, greeting :

Whereas, by the second article of the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, concluded at Washington, on the 22d day of February, 1819, between these United States and His Catholic Majesty, it is stipulated as follows: "His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida, the adjacent islands dependent on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property; archives and documents, which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them."

Now, therefore, I do hereby authorize and appoint you, as commissary of the United States, to receive from any and every person, who may be possessed of the said archives and documents, all and every one of the same; and the said archives and documents to keep in safe custody until further order for the disposal of the same shall be taken.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the said United States, at Washington, this 14th day of March, 1821, and in the forty-fifth year of the Independence of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President :

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Secretary of State.

Translation of the royal order of the King of Spain to the Captain General and Governor of the Island of Cuba, and of the Floridas.

FERDINAND THE SEVENTH, by the grace of God, and by the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, King of the Spains, to you, the Captain General and Governor of the Island of Cuba, and of the Floridas.

Know you, that, by a treaty concluded in the City of Washington, on the twenty-second of February of the last year, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, by Plenipotentiaries duly authorized for the purpose of arranging the differences which have existed between the Government of Spain and that of the United States of America, and the limits of their respective territories, there was stipulated, on the part of Spain, the cession to the United States of all the country situated east of the Mississippi known by the name of East and West Florida; the adjacent islands dependent upon the two Floridas being comprehended in said cession, together with all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, with the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces; it being provided, at the same time, that the inhabitants of the territories so ceded shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and that all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, in order that they may better effect their purpose, without being subject in either case to duties; and that those who prefer remaining in the Floridas shall be admitted, as soon as possible, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States; it being added, by another article of the same treaty, that the Spanish officers and troops shall evacuate the said territories ceded to the United States, six months after the exchange of the ratification of the same treaty, or sooner if possible, and shall give possession of them to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them; and that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. And I, having considered and examined the tenor of the articles of the treaty, after having obtained the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation with respect to the said cession, have thought proper to approve and ratify the treaty referred to, the ratification of which must be exchanged at Washington, with that which was formed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the same; after which exchange, the said treaty will begin to be obligatory on both Governments and their respective citizens; therefore, I command you, and ordain that, after the information, which shall be seasonably given you by my Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary at Washington, of the ratifications having been exchanged, you proceed, on your part, to make the proper dispositions, in order that, at the end of six months, counting from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, the Spanish officers and troops may evacuate the territories of both Floridas, and that possession of them be given to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them; in the understanding that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. You shall arrange, in proper time, the delivery of the islands adjacent and dependent upon the two Floridas, and the public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, as also the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the same two provinces, by placing them at the disposal of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them; and all the other papers, and the effects which belong to the nation, and which have not been comprehended and mentioned in the expressed clauses of the cession, you shall have conveyed and transported to another part of the Spanish possessions which may be most convenient for the public service; as, also, you shall take care that, previous to the delivery, it may be made known, by edicts, to all the present inhabitants of the Floridas, that they have power to remove to the Spanish territories and dominions, the sale or exportation of their effects being permitted to them by the United States at any time whatever, without being subject to duties; and, also, the advantages stipulated in favor of those who shall prefer to remain in the Floridas, to whom I have wished to give this last proof of the protection and affection which they have always experienced under the Spanish Government. Of the delivery which you may make, or may be made by your delegation in the form which has been expressed, you shall make, or cause to be made, a corresponding receipt, duly authenticated, for your discharge; and, in order that you may proceed with entire knowledge in the execution of this commission, there shall be likewise sent to you, by my Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, an authentic copy of the treaty referred to, of the twenty-second of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, with the insertion of the ratifications of both parties, and of the certificate relative to the exchange of the same; of which documents, and of this my royal order, you shall send a copy, in authentic form, to the Governors of both the Floridas, and to the person or persons who may have, in your name, the accomplishing of the delivery, if it have not been made by yourself.

All which you shall well and completely execute in the form which I have prescribed to you, agreeably to the public service; advising me of your having executed it through my underwritten Secretary of Despatch of State.

Given at Madrid, the twenty-fourth of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty.

FERDINAND.

HAVANA, April 28, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that, after alternate strong gales and calms, the Hornet did not anchor in this harbor until the 22d instant, too late for business, had it not been on Sunday.

Governor Mahy received us very graciously on the following day, when I delivered to him the royal order for the delivery to the United States of the Floridas; and, after exhibiting to him my commission, he inquired "when I wished to proceed." I immediately replied, "as soon as possible;" which gave rise to a long conference, in which I offered to be the bearer of his order, and urged the expediency of despatch, as being most conducive to the true interests of both Governments. His Excellency stated that he would do every thing in his power to expedite me. I asked, when? which he answered by saying as soon as the records could be examined, selected, and inventoried. I then, to save time, expressed a wish to know the bulk, and that some of these might be dispensed with; but the interpreter who had been called in, officially, and otherwise unnecessarily, told me (by way of interloper) that there would be about twenty boxes of them, and that form as well as regularity required a punctilious inspection of them before they could be delivered to me. On retiring, his Excellency told me that we should be satisfied with each other.

The next two days were to close the holidays; notwithstanding which, the interpreter called upon me, by order of the Governor, to require my commission for translation, and to say that I must put to writing the substance of my conversation with his Excellency, which I immediately did; copy of which is herewith sent, under date of the 24th instant.

Allowing one day to intervene, I waited upon the Governor on the 26th, to ascertain the progress making in the departments to expedite me. I was well received, and told that the necessary orders had been given, and that, as soon as the convoy about sailing for Spain had departed, my business should be particularly attended to.

The interpreter, whom I again saw at the Governor's, mentioned the appointment of an officer to accompany me to Pensacola, and that he held the draught of a letter from the Governor in answer to mine. I regret, however, to state, sir, that, to the moment of closing this despatch, I have not received it, or any communication from him. I have, however, reason to hope that, on the arrival of the Intendant, hourly expected from the country, my stay will not be prolonged more than one week.

As some circumstances may occur during my agency which may be worthy of your notice, to be taken abstractedly, I shall submit them by reference as abstracts, and prepare them accordingly.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Mr. Forbes to Governor Mahy.

HAVANA, April 24, 1821.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: When I had the honor of delivering into your Excellency's hands the royal order of His Catholic Majesty, through his Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, for the delivery to the Government of the United States of the Floridas, conformably to the treaty ratified on the 22d February last, I took occasion to present my commission from the President, and to submit various reasons for carrying into immediate effect the stipulations of said treaty, by offering to be the bearer of the final order of possession, and of the archives and public documents.

If arguments were necessary to carry into effect a treaty as illustrative in its stipulations of the honor of the Spanish Government as, in its ratification, it is of the moderation and justice of that of the United States, and farther, in its completion, by the solid foundation it lays of a perpetual friendship between the two nations, I would offer the following for your Excellency's consideration:

That the messenger of His Catholic Majesty was nearly four months in reaching Washington, while the ratification of the treaty at Madrid reached this island in a few weeks.

That, from the 24th October, 1821, (date of the ratification at Madrid,) to the present day, a period of six months has been afforded, of which His Catholic Majesty's officers and subjects have virtually availed themselves in preparing for the surrender of the Floridas—an evident advantage to one party not unworthy of consideration, since no charge of delay has been ascribed to it.

That, while a natural impulse is felt on the one hand, by the citizens of the United States, to become possessed of a promised land, an anxiety equally natural has been manifested on the other, that of the Spanish subjects, to retire from a country about to change its government.

That the season for calms and contrary winds is fast approaching, which is calculated to impede seriously His Catholic Majesty's forces; while that of rain and of sultry weather may prove very injurious to the troops of the United States.

The gracious manner in which your Excellency has already evinced his disposition to satisfy these demands upon His Catholic Majesty's Government as soon as practicable, are such sources of satisfaction as will be highly appreciated by the President. I hope, therefore, that, according to the stipulations of the treaty, your Excellency will, with the least possible delay, appoint an officer to carry the ultimate orders for possession of the Floridas, by the constituted authorities of the United States, to accompany me in the Hornet sloop of war, Captain Read.

That the archives and documents relating to the Floridas may be accordingly delivered over to me.

That a mode may be adopted for the transmission to the Government of the United States of the final order (in duplicate form) from your Excellency, upon the sub-governors, for the delivery of the Floridas, in case of any accident to the officer accompanying me, and in any event for the delivery of East Florida contemporaneously with that of West Florida, whither the Hornet is bound. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES,

Commissary and Agent of the U. S.

His Exc'y Don NICHOLAS MAHY.

HAVANA, May 5, 1821.

SIR: Since I had the honor of addressing you on the 28th ultimo, I availed myself of the earliest opportunity of reminding the Governor of the disposition he had evinced of expediting me. This was afforded me incidentally on the 1st instant, when Mr. Warner desired me to present him as the commercial agent of the United States. After his Excellency gave this gentleman to understand, very pointedly, that he could not recognise him, or view him in any other light than as a merchant, divested of all public character, I observed to him that, as the convoy had sailed, I hoped his Excellency would enable me to proceed; upon which I was told that he was anxious to be disencumbered of the country, that orders had been given, and every necessary disposition was making by his secretary, with whom the matter now was, and by whom I should be apprized.

An assurance so gratifying was promptly met by a return of thanks for the early attention he appeared to have shown to my business; under which favorable impression I was about retiring, when it occurred to me to ask his Excellency whether he knew that the Intendant had given his orders on the subject? He appeared ignorant of any occasion for the interference of that officer, and put the question to the interpreter, who hesitatingly replied that "he might have."

This unexpected inconsonancy induced me to obtain an introduction to the register of the records which are in the department of the Intendant, with whom I conversed freely, and was told that most of the papers of this office were those of accountability, and unnecessary to the Government of the United States; that about ten boxes containing the records of grants of land in West Florida were taken by an insurgent privateer out of the vessel in which Governor Mazot was a passenger from Pensacola.

Having brought letters of introduction to the Intendant, which were, on my arrival, sent to him in the country, from whence he wrote me a note to say that he would be in town in a few days, I therefore felt myself at liberty to wait upon his secretary, to ascertain when he would arrive; he answered that it was very uncertain, and probably not before the middle of the month.

As the silence of the Governor and of his secretary might be attributed to the frequent holidays, I sought an occasion to see the former, by accompanying Captain Read to obtain an order to apprehend a man charged, as a citizen of the United States, with depredating on our commerce. His Excellency received us with his characteristic complacency, and agreed upon a course of procedure, reconciling his official duties with the rites of hospitality; then putting both his hands upon my shoulders, in the most friendly manner, said to me in French, (having previously conversed in Spanish,) "Quant à notre affaire, j'espère vous expédier sous peu de jours." I had scarcely time to thank him before he added "au moins d'ici"—meaning, no doubt, his office.

I have been thus minute in my detail, sir, that you might know precisely the situation in which my agency stands; and without calling attention to the various buzzes I have heard, I feel it my duty to advert to one which, if well founded, may be of vast importance; it is, that "the Government is very much in arrears to the officers, both civil and military, in the ceded provinces." In this case, moral obligation and honor may impel, or obvious policy may prescribe, that some provision or arrangement may be made for their satisfaction, previous to their change of position, and thus at least cause delay.

With the treaty before me, I see no other alternative than that of yielding, however reluctantly, to the movements of the Governor, hoping that no political changes in Europe can take place to thwart the just expectations of our nation, or alter the pacific policy of its Government. I shall advise General Jackson of my progress here.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

HAVANA, May 7, 1821.

SIR: In referring you to the enclosed letter, which I had the honor of writing on the 5th instant, I have that of submitting to you a copy of my letter of this date to General Jackson, who is said to be at New Orleans, whither Mr. Thompson proceeded this day in the steamboat with it.

The Governor has sent me a message to wait upon him to-morrow morning, the result of which shall be immediately communicated to you.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Mr. Forbes to General Jackson.

HAVANA, May 7, 1821.

SIR: Commissioned by the President of the United States to deliver the royal order upon the Governor of Cuba, for the delivery of the Floridas to our Government, I was directed by the honorable Secretary of State to communicate with your Excellency upon my arrival in Pensacola, with the further order of the Governor to the Spanish authorities in the Floridas.

I arrived in the Hornet sloop of war on the 23d of last month, and was very favorably received by Governor Mahy, who expressed a wish to expedite me very promptly, as soon as the convoy for Spain sailed.

This assurance has been renewed to me occasionally since, but I regret to say that I am still uncertain when I can receive either the necessary order or the archives, which come also within the range of my commission.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by Mr. Thompson of making this communication, and take the liberty of suggesting to your Excellency the expediency of having a person at Pensacola from whom I can, on landing, receive such information as will enable me to communicate immediately with your Excellency by express.

I beg leave also to state that I have applied for an order, in duplicate form, embracing the delivery of East Florida, and that I shall endeavor to find a suitable opportunity of transmitting it to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia Island, subject to such orders as he may receive from the Department of State, or from your Excellency, taking the original with me in the Hornet.

As Mr. Thompson is fully acquainted with the nature of my mission, I refer your Excellency to him, with the assurance that no exertions on my part have been, or shall be, spared to give complete effect to objects of such national importance.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Commissary and Agent of the U. S.

His Ex^{cy} Major General A. JACKSON.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

HAVANA, May 9, 1821.

SIR: The message from the Governor, to which I had the honor of referring in my letter to you under date of the 7th instant, was found, on its delivery to me, to be nothing more than a proposal, through the commissary he is about sending, that "the Hornet should convey him to St. Augustine from Pensacola;" to which I could not assent, not only because she had other duties to perform, or of the delay which that mode of transmission of the order would occasion, but because I perceived in it a digression (otherwise immaterial) from the plan agreed upon in a former interview, viz: "that I should be the sole bearer of the orders." I therefore replied that I should wait upon his Excellency; and, considering it opportune, I did this with Captain Read, to explain and to discover, if possible, the chance of getting away. We found him, as on a former occasion, much engaged and fatigued by his personal exertions to procure relief for the inhabitants of St. Antonio, a town just burnt. He was less affable than before; and although he mentioned, as then, that every thing was in a fair train, and that he would give me a duplicate order for East Florida, yet he adverted to the term allowed by the treaty, and said that there were a great many little things to do. After leaving his Excellency, I heard that a petition had been sent to him that day from Pensacola, expressive of the attachment of the inhabitants to the Spanish Government; and, upon soliciting lands in this island, stated "that a Judge of the United States, of much influence and talent, had come there with a trunk of British titles to lands in West Florida, with which he had pledged himself to upset all the grants by Spain since the treaty of 1783."

In consequence of this unexpected and very unpleasant duty, and the still greater apprehension of its continuance, I have determined to proceed this morning into the country to see the Intendant, and ascertain whether he has any thing to do with the archives, and obtain an order that the proper officers may attend to their immediate arrangement and delivery.

By the enclosed paper, just received, it will be seen that General Jackson was, on the 27th of April, at New Orleans.

There is in this port the Kangaroo, British brig of war, from surveying the Bahama and Florida keys: a vessel of that nation is generally here—I mean public.

I remain, with great respect, &c.

J. G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec^y of State.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

HAVANA, May 14, 1821.

SIR: Pursuant to the resolution I had formed, and which I had the honor of communicating to you in my letter of the 9th instant, I proceeded on that day to St. Antonio, about twenty-seven miles distant. An excessively hot ride, with bad horses, prevented me from waiting on the Intendant before the next day, when he received me very well, and assured me there would be no difficulty in the way of despatching me; that he would write to the city on the next day for the necessary papers, which would be sent him on the succeeding day, and that immediately after he would return them completed. Agreeably to this calculation, I ought to have the archives from the Intendancy on the 16th instant, and shall call for them on that day accordingly.

On my return to the city I waited upon the Governor, and was told by his interpreter that he was very much engaged, but that my business was progressing. I begged him to acquaint his Excellency of my intention to see him on Monday, (this day.) I went accordingly, and met at the door my colleague, the Spanish commissary, who assured me that every thing was ready, and would be signed (firmada) this day, and that we might go to-morrow or the next day. I congratulated him, as well as myself, upon the occasion, but was nevertheless determined to see his Excellency, which I did instantly.

I found him much occupied, and, after some preliminary conversation on the excessive heat, represented to him that we had been here a considerable time, that the hot and unhealthy season was fast advancing, and that I hoped he would despatch us. He replied, "in a few days." I asked, "how many?" and observed, that a vessel was about sailing for the United States in the morning, and that I wished to advise my Government when I was to go. He answered that he would give me notice. The conversation being in French, he said further, "Eh, bien, ecrivez que ce sera dans huit ou dix jours ou quinze." Upon his observing that I appeared surprised at such a distant period, after the various promises, or rather assertions he had made, he added, "J'ai besoin de quelques papiers de dehors, que peuvent venir d'un jour à l'autre; et d'ailleurs, je suis extrêmement pressé de tout côté; un courrier partant demain pour l'Espagne, c'est obligé de me lever tous les jours à quatre heures du matin, et travailler jusqu'à minuit: fort heureusement, je jouis d'une bonne santé."

It was difficult for me to conceal my disappointment; yet, if my business required any exertion, sensible of the perplexities of his situation and of his arduous duties, I should, on consideration of them, be more willing to ascribe the further delay to them rather than to any secret influence, which it has not been in my power either to penetrate or detect.

I shall, on the sailing of the packet for Spain, if encouraged by an interview with the Intendant, address a note to his Excellency proposing to leave the archives until the return of the Hornet, provided he will despatch me immediately with the orders of the sub-governors upon the Floridas.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.,

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

HAVANA, May 17, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing to you the copy of a letter, dated yesterday, but received this forenoon, from Governor Mahy. The packet for Spain is expected to sail to-morrow, when I shall see his Excellency and the Intendant, and urge with both of them the fulfilment of their promises to despatch me.

I am, with the greatest respect, &c.,

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Substance of a letter from Governor Mahy, of Havana, to Mr. Forbes, dated

MAY 16, 1821.

That the Governor had observed Mr. Forbes's credentials from the President of the United States, dated at Washington, March 4, 1821, and which comprehend the second article of the Treaty of Friendship and Adjustment of Limits, concluded, 22d February, 1819, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, in virtue of which the Spanish Minister at Washington had transmitted to the Governor the royal order for the due execution of the stipulations of that treaty; and that the President had authorized Mr. Forbes, as agent and commissary of the United States, to deliver to him (the Governor) the said royal order, to the end that they might, in concert, make arrangements for the delivering up by the Governor, and by such other persons as are in possession, of the archives and documents, as well as the fulfilment of the other stipulations of the said treaty.

With respect to which, and to what is presented in the aforesaid second article, the Governor sends to Mr. Forbes the copy of the royal order communicated to the Government and Captain Generalship of Cuba, under date of the 12th of September, 1783, by the Minister of the Indies of His Catholic Majesty, and by the Count de Aranda, at Versailles, dated the 19th of the same month and year, on which the ratifications of their Majesties, Catholic and Britannic, were exchanged, inserting in that royal order the articles five, seven, and ten, of the definitive treaty of peace, which were formed at Versailles the 3d of September; this being an authentic document found in the archives of Cuba, relative to the property of the Floridas, to which the said second article of the treaty of cession refers.

In the year 1819, there were sent to Havana from West Florida various boxes of papers of the archives of that province, in disorder, and without indexes, the registering (registrar) or examining of which will require time.

Respecting East Florida, where there ought to be found all her archives, Governor Mahy would direct that Governor, as intrusted by him with the important commission, to make a formal delivery to Mr. Forbes of that province, as well as of the documents belonging to it. A similar despatch would be addressed to the commandant of West Florida.

Don Pedro de Alva, administrator of the post office in Pensacola, and comptroller of the military hospital, now returning to his post, will be charged with the despatch for the delivery of West Florida, and which despatch he is to put into the hands of that commandant, and afterwards he will proceed with the despatch for the commandant of the eastern province.

SIR: By the letters which I had the honor of addressing to you, under date of the 14th and 17th instant, you will perceive that I had entertained great hopes of being despatched, and had relied upon the influence of the Intendant. Agreeably to that of the 17th, I had made an arrangement with Mr. Layalla, an eminent counsellor and friend of the Intendant, to urge his immediate attention to my earnest solicitations. In the morning he called at the office with that view, and we learned, to our mortification and grief, that the Intendant had received a paralytic stroke, which deprived him of his speech. Thus the hand of Providence had interfered to thwart my most sanguine expectations, as, on the succeeding day, the greatest human efforts were unavailing, and he died, much lamented by all Americans, to whom he was considered an invaluable friend.

I waited on the same day upon the Governor, and received his usual assurance that, as soon as the packet sailed, I should be despatched. The funeral, which was of great pomp and ceremony, I attended, and at which I exchanged a salute with the Governor; it engaged the public attention the whole of yesterday, so that on this day I presented myself to the successor of the Intendant, before whom the secretary placed the agenda papers relating to the Floridas. They appeared to be few, and within a loose sheet, (chemise de bureau.) He inquired what had passed between the late Intendant and myself; upon hearing which, and upon my urging despatch, he said, "that the matter was new to him, and that he must require to-morrow or next day to investigate it." From thence I proceeded to the Governor's, and was informed that he was out soliciting, from house to house, subscriptions for the relief of the inhabitants of the burnt village of St. Antonio.

I was the more anxious to see his Excellency to-day, as the steam ship, by which this goes, offered a favorable opportunity of addressing you. I returned to the palace. The Governor, who appeared overwhelmed with business, apologised for keeping me so long, showed me some of the large packets made up for Pensacola, said they were making copies, and that the day after to-morrow he hoped to give me free (franqueza). I then reminded him of his promise to give me the duplicate order to send to East Florida; he told me that he had a merchantman. I proposed and urged, as most expedient, that I should forward it by an officer of the United States; to which he assented. I have, therefore, put in requisition, by letter to Captain Read, the United States schooner Nonsuch, Lieutenant Turner, now here, by which I propose to send the duplicate, under cover, to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia Island, subject to such orders as you or General Jackson may transmit to him. I am, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

HAVANA, May 23, 1821.

SIR: The steamship Robert Fulton sailed yesterday for Charleston with the letter of that date, which I had the honor of addressing to you. Since which I have received one from the secretary of the Intendant, soliciting that I should carry to Pensacola ten thousand dollars, and as much to East Florida, to pay the troops; which sums would have been doubled under the late Intendant. I have answered that I would cheerfully do this if they would ship them without delay, say in equal sums, in the Hornet and Nonsuch. Captain Read is indisposed—I hope not seriously.

I am, with the greatest respect, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

HAVANA, May 28, 1821.

SIR: From the convention with the Governor, which I had the honor of detailing to you in my letter of the 23d instant, it was natural to suppose that on the 24th I would have been despatched.

I waited upon his Excellency to remind him of his promise, but he appeared to have forgotten it, and again mentioned press of business, and the term of "pocos dias," which became more familiar than reconcilable to me. He had just received a letter from the Governor of Pensacola, which he showed me, stating an inquiry on the part of General Jackson as to the delivery of the province. The sub-governor, in forwarding the General's letter and his answer, asked for orders, which his Excellency was about sending, and offered to take any letters from me; but I replied that the best communication I could make to him would be in person. He remarked that he thought our General "avoit la tête montée."

I addressed the Governor the letter, a copy of which is herewith, marked B, to which I received, on the 26th, the answer, copy also, marked C; upon the receipt of which, I called upon his Excellency, and was met by an affable apology for the unavoidable detention, assuring me that, as Saturday was general post day, the day after Sunday, he would positively despatch me on the succeeding day, (the present.) I could not but acquiesce. However, after learning in conference, that there would be no archives ready, I immediately, on retiring, addressed him the letter, of which a copy is enclosed, marked D, to which I have not yet received an answer in writing; but, on calling at the Governor's, was told it had been written, together with a copy of the orders to the sub-governors of the Floridas, but, on a revision, there was some expression which his Excellency thought proper to alter, and on which account it could not be handed to me before to-morrow, when I should positively be despatched. I hope, therefore, that, the money being on board, my next will be from the office, and put in charge of Captain Turner, of the Nonsuch, who will forward it immediately to the United States, whither he is proceeding, after landing the Spanish Commissary and specie at St. Augustine, and after delivering my despatch to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia.

I am, with the greatest respect, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

A.

HAVANA, May 26, 1821.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your official letter of the 24th current, in which, among various reflections which it contains, I am requested, as soon as possible, to complete the delivery of the Floridas. You can sufficiently testify my desires for the conclusion of this business, and in my last conference I showed that it would be in a few days after. Considering that the stipulation of the treaty grants six months for its completion, and three have already elapsed, as you mention, it does not depend upon delays on the part of this Captaincy General; and, desirous to give further proofs of the good intention of this Government in fulfilling the said royal order, I have nominated the Auditor of War of the province of East Florida, who is at present there with his license, and ought to be present at the delivery, to convey the proper order to the Governor; in which understanding I should think that he might be conveyed in the vessel which you tell me would be destined for that service. Thus I have answered your said official letter.

I remain, with the highest consideration, and pray God to preserve you many years.

NICHOLAS MAHY.

B.

Mr. Forbes to Governor Mahy.

HAVANA, May 24, 1821.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your Excellency's letter of the 16th instant, acknowledging the receipt by my hands of the royal order for the delivery of the Floridas to the Government of the United States, advising me that measures are taking for the delivery of the archives, and for the further execution of the treaty between the two Governments, and enclosing to me copies of the fifth, seventh, and tenth articles of the definitive treaty of peace between Spain and Great Britain in 1783.

In the first interview, your Excellency was pleased to manifest a readiness to despatch me with the requisite documents in a few days, or as soon as the convoy for Spain had sailed, which was immediately communicated in corresponding terms to the President of the United States, who has relied, accordingly, upon its execution. Since then, a period of near five weeks has elapsed, during which every day has appeared to have increased your Excellency's avocations.

While your Excellency has been incessantly engaged in performing the arduous duties of his [your] important and highly responsible station, it has fallen to my humble lot to be only the idle spectator of the ravages of the climate, and, in contemplating their secret and rapid progress, to flatter myself with the hope of embarking so as to rescue the officers and crews of the ships from their fatal effects.

As three months of a favorable season have passed away in preliminary measures, and as it appears uncertain when the archives here of the Floridas can be delivered over to me, I crave the reference again of your Excellency to my last despatch, confirming the various reasons offered in conference for my early departure, and therefore propose that if any further researches should be necessary for the discovery of the said archives, they might be delivered when more convenient to the Spanish Government; that I should be allowed to proceed immediately to West Florida with the commissary appointed to carry the final order to the sub-governor there; and, lastly, that a duplicate order be given at once, as agreed upon, to the Governor of East Florida, for the delivery of that province to the constituted authorities of the United States, together with the archives which are declared to be on the spot: which last order I will, with your Excellency's permission, despatch immediately by a public officer of the United States.

I am, with sentiments of the highest consideration, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES,

Commissary and Agent of the U. S.

His Exc'y Don NICHOLAS MAHY.

C.

MAY 23, 1821.

SIR: The Intendant ad interim commands me to ask you whether or not it will be inconvenient to transport on board the vessel of your nation twenty thousand dollars, which he wishes to remit for the disposal of the Governors of the two Floridas—ten thousand to Pensacola, and ten thousand to St. Augustine—in the supposition that the ship will go to either of those ports.

This quantity being precisely destined for the assistance of the troops of both garrisons, and for the purpose of avoiding particular agreements when the completion of the treaty between both Powers takes effect, the said Intendant ad interim has no doubt that you will have the goodness to comply with this service in the spirit of harmony and consequent friendship.

I have the honor to express my hope of your answer, and therefore to offer myself to your disposal, as your most obedient, humble servant,

JUAN NEPOM. DE AROCHA.

D.

HAVANA, May 26, 1821.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I had the honor of receiving your Excellency's letter of this date, informing me of the appointment of the Auditor of War of the province of East Florida to become the bearer of your Excellency's orders on the sub-governors of that province for its delivery, in form, to the constituted authorities of the United States, and renewing to me your Excellency's disposition to despatch me in a few days.

The accidental arrival here of the United States schooner Nonsuch enables me to meet the views of the Spanish Government, by putting her in requisition for the purpose of conveying some specie of the Intendant, as well as of conveying said officer; she therefore awaits your Excellency's despatches.

I beg leave to know if I understood your Excellency to say, in conference to-day, that the archives of West Florida, which are in the public offices here, are of a character involving importance only to Spain; that, in the further examination of them, such as interest the Government of the United States should be set apart and transmitted to our Government.

It would be agreeable to me, also, to have from your Excellency copies of the orders transmitted by him to the sub-governors of the Floridas, touching their delivery to the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

His Exc'y Governor MAHY, &c.

Mr. Forbes to Señor Juan Nepom. de Arocha.

HAVANA, May 23, 1821.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your letter of this date, desiring, on the part of the Intendant, that the ship of war of the United States should convey to the Floridas twenty thousand dollars on account of the Spanish Government.

Please to assure the Intendant that it affords me much pleasure to accord with his wishes, and that, in the same spirit of accommodation and friendly intercourse which ought, and I hope may always, subsist between the American and Spanish Governments, the money shall be taken on board the Hornet for Pensacola, and the Nonsuch for St. Augustine; but my duty prescribes that no further delay can be the consequence. I have, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES,

Commissary and Agent of the U. S.

HORNET, OFF HAVANA, May 30, 1821.

SIR: Since I had the honor of addressing you, on the 28th instant, I have received an answer from the Governor to my letter of that date, enclosing copies of his orders to the sub-governors of the Floridas, and declaring that the archives should be transmitted to the Government of the United States as soon as they were selected.

Immediately on reading the orders just referred to, I perceived that the sub-governors were directed to deliver the provinces to me; I therefore waited upon his Excellency, and requested that he would insert "to the constituted authorities of the United States;" to which he readily assented, but said, as the despatches were written, it would require a particular order, which he issued, and of which copies are herewith, together with those written under date of the 5th instant.

The Governor, who was exceedingly polite, invited Captains Read and Turner and myself to dinner, at which I alone attended; and after which he gave the new instructions in relation to the delivery. He asked if I was now satisfied. I mentioned a further wish that he had been more pointed to the Governors as to the period of evacuation, and urged the season as one which would expose the Spanish troops to much delay and inconvenience. He said he knew, from General Jackson's character, that he was impatient, but that the treaty was of considerable importance, now happily and formally concluded; and he hoped that all regard would be paid to its happy conclusion; that the Governors would use all due diligence.

I have the satisfaction of saying, at last, that I embarked this morning with the Spanish commissary, but that the one for St. Augustine, just appointed, will not be able to proceed in the Nonsuch until the day after to-morrow. I have preferred leaving him, to a moment's unnecessary delay, on my part, for the delivery of West Florida.

I have addressed a copy of the orders of which he is the bearer to Colonel Bankhead, or commanding officer at Amelia, subject, as before mentioned, to such directions as he should receive from the Department, or from General Jackson, as Governor of the Territory.

It has been a source of regret and vexation to me to have met with this unforeseen detention, but I hope and trust that you will have perceived, in the course of my agency, that every exertion has been used, and that the delay may be attributed more to a tardiness inherent in those with whom I have had to do, than to any political or commercial advantage expected to be derived from it by speculation. The authorities here consider it a prompt despatch!

I request your attention to my draft of this date in favor of Messrs. Gutierrez & Morland for $350, chargeable to my account.

I am, with the greatest respect, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS,

HAVANA, May 5, 1821.

The time having arrived for beginning to take the necessary measures for the evacuation of West Florida, at present under your command, to make formal delivery of it to the authorized commissary of the Government of the United States, citizen James G. Forbes, within the space of six months, or sooner if possible, counting from the 22d of February last, the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty formed between the two Powers, I have resolved to charge you with the execution of this important commission with the brevity and order which it demands, and for the good event of which I forwarded to you some preparatory instructions, which ought necessarily to have served to dispose each branch to have been arranged as an object so interesting demands. You will have, therefore, to agree with the commissary of the Government of the United States on the mode of transporting the troops, munitions, effects, &c., according to the articles of the treaty, a copy of which I enclose, and which will give information on the subject. The detachments of each corps will be reunited under the command of the chief, or its senior officer, taking all the precautions which you think convenient for maintaining good order in this delicate circumstance. At the moment of giving possession of that country, and of quitting it, I recommend to you to do what you can for apportioning to the families which may wish to be transferred to this island all the means which may be in your power, and the necessary protection which I myself have solicited from the said commissary in his kindness, manifesting on my part how agreeable it would be, as they come to live amongst our people.

May God preserve you many years.

NICOLAS MAHY.

HAVANA, May 27, 1821.

Although it is expressed in the order for the delivery of the province under your command to Don James G. Forbes, the commissioned agent of the United States to that effect, it ought also to be understood that, in case of any accident happening to that gentleman, (which God forbid,) it shall be delivered to the authorities of the said United States, legally constituted, who may present themselves to you for the completing of the afore-cited order.

God preserve you many years.

ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA,
July 13, 1821.

SIR: I have handed over to Major Cross, for your examination, a book containing copies of the official correspondence which resulted in the reception and occupancy of this province.

You will likewise receive, herewith, the official document of the interchange of authority, which was formally executed at the period when the American and Spanish flags were flying on the standard.

You have enclosed a communication and document accompanied, from the Spanish Commissioner, which I have informed him has been referred to the American Government for decision, on the subject of several pieces of artillery at Amelia Island.

The archives relating to private property are so numerous that it would be an endless task to have them transcribed; and I therefore claimed them as they were, and I deemed it of great importance to particularize, as you will find from my letter of the 3d instant, and numbered 26, owing to my receiving information that a large portion of these documents were packed for transportation. This letter had the effect of keeping all the documents here until your decision is made with the Spanish authorities.

The documents are forwarded by Major Cross, on the part of the Spanish Commissioner, to the Minister at Washington, from which you will be enabled to settle the points left open with them speedily.

I shall be gratified to receive a communication from you, if my services in this instance have corresponded with the interests of my country.

As I have not been informed of what allowance will be authorized as a compensation for the duty which I have performed, will you be kind enough to give me the necessary information on this subject, directed to Pensacola?

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT BUTLER, U. S. Com'r.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

NOTE.—I am just informed by the Spanish Commissioner that his documents will not be sent by Major Cross, but will be transmitted immediately by another conveyance.

Act of Cession of East Florida.

In the place of St. Augustine, and on the tenth day of July, eighteen hundred and twenty-one, Don Jose Coppinger, colonel of the national armies, and commissioner appointed by his Excellency the Captain General of the island of Cuba, to make a formal delivery of the said place and province of East Florida to the Government of the United States of America, by virtue of the treaty of cession concluded at Washington, on the 22d of February, eighteen hundred and nineteen, and the royal schedule of delivery of the twenty-fourth of October of the last year, annexed to the documents mentioned in the certificate, that form a heading to these instruments: in testimony thereof, and the adjutant general of the southern division of said States, Colonel Don Robert Butler, duly authorized by the aforesaid Government to receive the same: We having had several conferences, in order to carry into effect our respective commissions, as will appear by our official communications; and having received by the latter the documents, inventories, and plans, appertaining to the property and sovereignty of the Spanish nation held in the province, and in its adjacent island depending thereon, with the sites, public squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, and other works, not being private property, and the same having been preceded by the arrangements and formalities that, for the greater solemnity of the important fact, they have judged proper, there has been verified, at four o'clock on the evening of this day, the complete and personal delivery of the fortifications, and all else of this aforesaid province, to the commissioner, officers, and troops of the United States, and, in consequence thereof, having embarked for the Havana the military and civil officers and Spanish troops in the American transports provided for this purpose, the Spanish authorities having this moment ceased the exercise of their functions, and those appointed by the American Government having begun theirs, duly noting that we have transmitted to our Governments the doubts occurring whether the artillery ought to be comprehended in the fortifications; and if the public archives relating to private property ought to remain and be delivered to the American Government by virtue of the cession; and that there remain in the fortifications, until the aforesaid resolution is made, the artillery, munitions, and implements specified in a particular inventory, awaiting on these points, and the others appearing in question in our correspondence, the superior decision of our respective Governments, and which is to have, whatever may be the result, the most religious compliance at any time that it may arrive, and which the possession that at present appears given shall not serve as an obstacle. In testimony of which, and that this may at all times serve as an expressive and formal receipt in this act, we, the subscribing commissioners, sign four instruments of the same tenor, in the English and Spanish languages, at the above-mentioned place, and said day, month, and year.

Colonel Butler to the Secretary of State.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 20, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that the understanding which at present exists between the

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

Governor who is the commissioner on the part of Spain, and myself, is, that the exchange of flags will be effected on or about the 1st of July, and in a manner which I trust will be deemed satisfactory by my Government.

I shall avail myself of the earliest opportunity after that event to give you in detail the whole of the proceedings on that subject.

I was induced to believe, from information received some time since, that the provisions destined to subsist the Spanish forces to the Havana had arrived at Amelia Island, and I therefore gave an order for their delivery to the officer commanding the detachment destined to occupy the fortress at this place. A partial supply only was delivered, and that out of the supply for the troops at that place. I have therefore despatched a transport to Amelia to procure the supply necessary, and, if not in store, to purchase such as may be wanting. I am without any advices from the Commissary General's department on this subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT BUTLER.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

The Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 12, 1821.

SIR: By direction of the President of the United States, I have the honor of transmitting to you three commissions:

1. As commissioner to receive possession of the provinces of East and West Florida, conformably to the treaty between the United States and Spain; concluded on the 22d of February, 1819.

2. As Governor of the whole territories of which possession is to be thus taken.

3. As commissioner vested with special and extraordinary powers, conformably to the stipulations of the treaty, and to the act of Congress for carrying the same into execution; copies of both of which are also among the enclosures with this letter.

Together with the Spanish ratification of the treaty, there was transmitted to the Spanish Minister at this place a royal order to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba for delivering possession of the provinces of East and West Florida, according to the stipulations of the second article of the treaty.

Colonel James G. Forbes has been appointed by the President agent and commissary to deliver this royal order to the Governor of Cuba, to concert and arrange with him the execution of it, and to receive any documents or archives which may be at the Havana, and which are stipulated to be delivered by this article. A copy of his instructions is herewith enclosed, by which you will perceive that he is to deliver over to you all such documents or archives as he may receive at the Havana. It is desirable that those relating to each of the two provinces should be kept distinct from each other, and that this Government should be informed generally of their character and quantity.

Colonel Forbes is to take passage at New York in the United States sloop of war Hornet, Captain Read; and, on arriving at Pensacola, is to give you immediate notice, that you may repair thither to receive possession of that place. The Hornet is to remain there to escort the transports in which the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage are to be conveyed to the Havana.

The Spanish Minister has expressed a strong wish that no troops of the United States may be introduced into Pensacola or St. Augustine until after the evacuation of those of Spain. The object of this request being to avoid any possible unpleasant altercations between the soldiers of the two nations, the President thinks it reasonable to comply with it, unless you should be of opinion that it will be attended with inconvenience. In that event, he relies that you will take every measure of precaution which may be necessary to guard against any such collisions between the soldiers; and he trusts with confidence that, in every arrangement for the evacuation, the utmost delicacy will be observed to avoid every thing which might tend to wound the feelings of any of the Spanish officers, soldiers, or subjects, who are to remove.

It is the President's desire that you should appoint General Gaines, or such other officer as you may deem expedient, to receive possession of St. Augustine; and that the same instructions should be applied to the execution of that service. The United States brig Enterprise or schooner Porpoise will be ordered to proceed to that place to escort the transports which are to convey the Spanish officers and troops thence to the Havana. The care of providing the transports at both places is referred to you. The number of troops at either place is not known, but supposed to amount to about five hundred men at each. The stipulation is understood to include civil as well as military officers, and provisions as well as passage.

Instructions will be given by the Secretary of War to the quartermasters and commissaries to furnish to your orders provisions and transports for the conveyance of the Spanish officers and troops. It is expected they will be supplied at New Orleans and Mobile for those to embark within the Gulf, and at Savannah and Charleston for those going from St. Augustine.

A copy and translation of the royal order to the Governor of Cuba, for delivering the possession of the provinces, is among the enclosures herewith. You will observe that it includes expressly the islands appurtenant to them. It will be proper that attention should be paid to taking possession of all these islands, but it may not be necessary that a formal delivery of them in every case should be made.

On receiving from the Governors of West and of East Florida possession of those respective provinces, it will be proper to exchange certificates of the time and mode of the transaction. Orders for the delivery of any military posts within the provinces will be expected, and they will be occupied by detachments of our troops, as you may deem expedient.

As soon as the possession shall be transferred, you will, in pursuance of your authority over the ceded territories, issue proclamations announcing the fact. A form adapted from that which was issued on the first occupation of Louisiana is herewith enclosed, to be modified as the circumstances, in your opinion, may require.

The powers vested in you by the enclosed commissions are also conformable to those which were intrusted to the Governor of Louisiana under an act of Congress of similar import. The President is satisfied that they will be exercised by you with a due regard as well to the privileges and usages of the inhabitants under the Government to which they have been subject, as to the personal and social rights to which they will be entitled by the stipulations of the treaty, and as associates to the union of these States. The money paid into the Spanish treasury before the delivery of possession, and whatever may be due thereto at that date, is to be considered as the property of Spain. Payments and debts subsequent to that date will belong, of course, to the United States.

The laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, and those relating to the introduction of persons of color, being extended by the act of Congress to the territory, the execution of them will be superintended by officers to be appointed for the several collection districts to be established by the President conformably to the law.

Your compensation as Governor will be at the rate of five thousand dollars a year. As commissioner for receiving possession of the provinces, such reasonable expenses as may be incurred will be allowed. Whenever your military command ceases, your salary as Governor will commence.

In the taking possession of St. Augustine and East Florida, similar proceedings to those relative to the occupation of West Florida will be proper. Both provinces being placed under your direction, the proclamation to be issued there will be in your name; and General Gaines, or such other officer as you may appoint, will be instructed to consider himself, for all the purposes of the Government, subject to your orders.

At the ensuing session of Congress, it is presumed one of the earliest objects of attention to that body will be to make further provision for the government of these Territories. The President wishes you, in the interval, to collect and communicate to this Department any information relating to the country and its inhabitants, which may be useful to the exercise of the legislative authority of the Union concerning them.

For the expenses incident to the services herewith required, you will draw upon this Department. Strict economy is to be observed in incurring them; and I have urgently to request the transmission, as early as possible, of all the accounts resulting from them, with the vouchers necessary for their settlement at the Treasury.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Commission to General Jackson to receive possession of the Floridas.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism and abilities of Major General Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, I have appointed him commissioner of the United States, with full power and authority to him to take possession of, and occupy, the territories ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Washington on the twenty-second day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and for that purpose to repair to the said territories, and there to execute and perform all such acts and things touching the premises as may be necessary for fulfilling his appointment, conformably to the said treaty and the laws of the United States: and I do, moreover, authorize the said Andrew Jackson to appoint any person or persons in his stead to receive possession of any part of the said ceded territories, according to the stipulations of the said treaty.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1821, and of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Commission to General Jackson as Governor of the Floridas.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas, the Congress of the United States, by an act passed on the third day of the present month, did provide that, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the territories of East and West Florida, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty between the said parties, concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: Now, know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and abilities of Major General Andrew Jackson, I do, in virtue of the above-recited act, appoint him to exercise, within the said ceded territories, under such limitations as have been, or may hereafter be, prescribed to him by my instructions, and by law, all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the Governor and Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, and by the Governors of East and West Florida, within the said provinces, respectively, and do authorize and empower him, the said Andrew Jackson, to execute and fulfil the duties of this present appointment according to law, and to have and to hold the same, with all its powers and privileges, until the end of the next session of Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the said territories so ceded by Spain to the United States: Provided, however, (and it is the true intent and meaning of these presents,) That the said Andrew Jackson, or any person acting under him, or in the said territories, shall have no power or authority to lay or collect any new or additional taxes, or to grant or confirm to any person or persons, whomsoever, any title or claims to lands within the same.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given [L. s.] under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1821, and of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Special Commission to Major General Andrew Jackson, for carrying into effect the stipulations of the Treaty.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to Andrew Jackson, greeting:

Whereas, by an act of Congress passed on the third day of the present month, entitled "An act for carrying into execution the Treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen," it is provided that, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the territories ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, between the two nations, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: And whereas, on the tenth day of the present month, I did, by letters-patent, under the seal of the United States, in pursuance of the powers vested in me as aforesaid, appoint you, the said

Andrew Jackson, to exercise, under certain limitations, within the said ceded territories, all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the Governor and Captain General and by the Intendant of Cuba, and by the Governors of East and West Florida, within the said provinces, respectively, with the clauses and conditions in the said letters patent expressed: And whereas it appears to me expedient that you should be vested with the other powers hereinafter specified: Therefore, be it known that, in virtue of the above recited act of Congress, I do, by these presents, appoint and authorize you, the said Andrew Jackson, to administer the government, with the existing authorities, in the best manner in your power, for the present, and to report without delay the actual state, with such alterations as you may think advisable, that further instructions may be given respecting the same; and I do, moreover, authorize you to suspend any officer or officers in the said territories which the public good may seem to you to require, with the exception always of such as are or may be appointed by the President of the United States, making a report to this Government of your proceedings therein. These letters patent are to continue in force until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the said territories so as aforesaid ceded by Spain to the United States, and unless it should be sooner revoked by the President of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given [L. s.] under my hand, at the City of Washington, the 20th day of March, A. D. 1821, and of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Form of Proclamation.

By Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the provinces of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the Island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of said provinces, respectively.

Whereas, by the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain, on the 22d day of February, 1819, and duly ratified, the provinces of the Floridas were ceded by Spain to the United States, and the possession of the said provinces is now in the United States:

And whereas the Congress of the United States, on the 3d day of March, in the present year, did enact that, until the end of the first session of the seventeenth Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said provinces be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the said provinces shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the President of the United States has, by his commission, bearing date the 20th day of said March, invested me with all the powers, and charged me with the several duties heretofore held and exercised by the Captain General, Intendant, and Governors, aforesaid:

I have therefore thought fit to issue this my proclamation, making known the premises, and to declare that the government heretofore exercised over the said provinces, under the authority of Spain, has ceased, and that that of the United States of America is established over the same; that the inhabitants thereof will be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; that, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess; that all laws and municipal regulations which were in existence at the cessation of the late Government remain in full force; and all civil officers charged with their execution, except those whose powers have been specially vested in me, and except, also, such officers as have been intrusted with the collection of the revenue, are continued in their functions during the pleasure of the Governor for the time being, or until provision shall otherwise be made.

And I do hereby exhort and enjoin all the inhabitants and other persons within the said provinces to be faithful and true in their allegiance to the United States, and obedient to the laws and authorities of the same, under full assurance that their just rights will be under the guardianship of the United States, and will be maintained from all force and violence from without or within.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand. Given, &c.

From the Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, at Nashville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, March 20, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the third commission referred to in the instructions of this office to you of the 12th instant; and to be, with respect, your obedient and humble servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

From the Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, Nashville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, March 23, 1821.

SIR: By the second article of the Florida Treaty, it is stipulated that, with the Territories of East and West Florida, the fortifications within the same are ceded and to be delivered to the United States; but no express mention is made of the cannon belonging to them.

By the seventh article of the same treaty, it is provided that the United States shall furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana; but no mention is made of the transportation of cannon, nor is there any express engagement on the part of the United States to furnish provisions to the Spanish officers and troops on the passage.

It is the opinion of the President that, by a fair and just construction of the treaty, the cannon belonging to the fortifications are to be considered as appendages to them, included in the cession, and are, therefore to be left with them.

On the same principle, he is of opinion that, with the transports and escorts to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage, the provisions necessary for the passage are also to be furnished at the expense of the United States, although not specially mentioned in the treaty, and orders have accordingly been given for the supply of provisions.

It is, however, possible that the Spanish Governors of East and West Florida may, upon a different construction of the treaty, claim to carry away the cannon from the fortifications, because they are not expressly named in the article.

You will, in that case, claim that they should be left with the fortifications, and insist that, upon the principle of the other construction, the United States are not bound to furnish provisions for the passage of the officers and troops. You will state that the supply has been ordered in the confidence that the benefit of the same liberal construction of the treaty will operate in favor of the United States; and that, if it be not extended to them, they will have a just claim to be reimbursed for the expense of supplying the provisions.

You will add that, as there is no engagement on their part, express or implied, to furnish the means of transporting the cannon, they have made, and can make, no provision for that purpose.

Should the Spanish Governors allege that their orders are express for having the cannon carried away, you will leave it to them to make provision for their transportation, and report forthwith the facts to this Department.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

From the Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of East and West Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, May 22, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor, by direction of the President of the United States, of informing you that he has established within the Territories of East and West Florida three districts for the collection of the revenue, namely, at Pensacola, St. Marks, and St. Augustine. He has at the same time thought proper to appoint two territorial secretaries and two judges, one of each to reside at Pensacola, and the other at St. Augustine; the revenue district of St. Mark's to be included within the judicial district of Pensacola. He has thought the appointment of one marshal sufficient for the whole territory, authorizing him to appoint a deputy either for St. Augustine or Pensacola, while he shall reside himself at the other of those places. I subjoin hereto a list of the several persons appointed to these offices.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[List of officers referred to in the above letter.]

Eligius Fromentin, of Louisiana, to be Judge of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the Cape; to reside at Pensacola.

Alexander Anderson, of Tennessee, to be Attorney of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the Cape; to reside at Pensacola.

William P. Duval, of Kentucky, to be Judge of the United States for East Florida, with the exception of that part which lies westward of the Cape; to reside at St. Augustine.

John G. Bird, of Georgia, to be Attorney of the United States for East Florida, with the exception of that part which lies westward of the Cape; to reside at St. Augustine.

James Grant Forbes, of New York, to be Marshal of the United States in and for East and West Florida, with authority to appoint a deputy either for St. Augustine or Pensacola, while he shall himself reside at the other of those places.

George Walton, of Georgia, to be Secretary in and for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the Cape.

William G. D. Worthington, of Maryland, to be Secretary in and for East Florida, with the exception of that part which lies westward of the Cape; to reside at St. Augustine.

Mark Harden, of North Carolina, Collector of the Customs at St. Mark's.

John Rodman, of New York, Collector of the Customs, and Richard S. Hackley, of Virginia, Surveyor and Inspector of the Revenue at St. Augustine.

Alexander Scott, of the District of Columbia, Collector of the Customs; William S. Smith, of the District of Columbia, Naval Officer; and Charles Jenkins, of South Carolina, Surveyor and Inspector of the Revenue at Pensacola.

The Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of East and West Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 23, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 2d, 10th, and 12th of April, from Nashville. The request for instructions relating to the Seminole Indians, contained in the first of them, having been referred by the President to the Secretary of War, has been answered through that department.

The list of officers appointed by the President within the territory, which is now transmitted to you, consists altogether of citizens of the United States, the objects of their respective functions being the introduction and establishment of the laws of the Union in the country.

It is not, however, the intention of the President that, in the distribution of official situations, the natives or inhabitants of the country itself should be overlooked. The offices, the duties of which relate to the civil and internal administration of the territory, will be those for which the qualifications of the people of the country will be peculiarly appropriate; and, leaving the distribution of them entirely to your discretion, he is confident it will be exercised with a just regard to the interest and feelings of the people of Florida, and in a manner which may tend at once to their satisfaction, and to render their change of condition as acceptable to their inclinations as it is hoped it will be propitious to their welfare.

I am, with much respect, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The Secretary of State to Andrew Jackson, Esq., Governor of Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 27, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 24th of April, 1st, 7th, 19th, 23d, and 30th of May, with their enclosures.

The conduct of the Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba in delaying, without any apparent satisfactory reason, the delivery of the orders to the Governors of East and West Florida for the evacuation of those provinces by the officers and troops of Spain, and in evading the delivery of all of the archives in his possession, and which, by a stipulation of the treaty, were to be given up, appears to have been very exceptionable.

The President has been disposed to make every allowance for the dilatory character of all transactions habitual to the officers of the Spanish Government. On receiving your letter of 19th May, he had thought it would be necessary to take measures, on a presumption that the unwarrantable delays of the Governor of Cuba would be still continued, which, under other circumstances, it would be very desirable to avoid. While these measures, however, were under consideration, intelligence was received from Colonel Forbes that he had at length received the orders for the delivery of the two provinces, and, immediately afterwards, that he had actually sailed from the Havana, on the 30th ultimo, for Pensacola. As the order to the Governor of St. Augustine had been despatched on the same day, and that order was received by him on the 7th instant, we are in daily expectation of receiving the information that that place has been delivered up to Colonel Butler, and that the Spanish officers and troops there have embarked for the Havana. The tenor of your correspondence with the Governor of Pensacola, as well as the character heretofore known of Governor Callava, have led to the hope and expectation that he will, on receiving the order of evacuation, manifest all the alacrity for carrying the treaty into execution which has been professed in his letters. It was therefore concluded here that it would be most advisable to take no step founded on the supposition that unnecessary delays will be still experienced in the evacuation of the Floridas, even after the orders for their evacuation shall have been received by the Governors of the respective provinces.

Your letters of the 23d and 30th ultimo have been forwarded to the President, who is in London. I shall inform you as soon as possible of his directions on your suggestion of a wish to be furnished with a check on the Branch Bank at New Orleans.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Secretary of State to Andrew Jackson, Esq., Governor of the Floridas.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 20, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th ultimo, with their enclosures. They were immediately transmitted to the President, who is at the Shannondale Springs.

As it will doubtless be one of the earliest objects of attention to Congress, at their ensuing session, to prepare a more permanent system of government for the Territories of Florida, I would solicit communications from you, as early and as ample as you can make them, of information which may serve to enlighten the inquiries upon which it may be expected that this legislation will be founded.

A reference to the laws of Congress which were from time to time enacted for the government of the Louisiana Territories, may serve to point out some of the particulars upon which information will be most desirable. In this view, the following acts are presented to your attention:

1. An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof. March 26, 1804. Laws of the United States, vol. 3, p. 603.

2. An act further providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans, March 2, 1805. Page 648.

3. An act further providing for the government of the district of Louisiana. Page 658. March 3, 1805.

4. An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans and the district of Louisiana. Page 652. March 2, 1805.

5. An act extending the powers of the Surveyor General to the Territory of Louisiana, and for other purposes. Vol. 4, p. 6. February 28, 1806.

6. An act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans and the district of Louisiana." Page 50. April 21, 1806.

7. An act respecting claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana. Page 111. March 3, 1807.

8. An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to land, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana. Vol. 4, p. 322. February 15, 1811.

9. An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes. Page 328. February 20, 1811.

10. An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved February 16, 1811. Page 356. March 3, 1811.

11. An act for ascertaining the titles and claims to lands in that part of Louisiana which lies east of the river Mississippi and island of New Orleans. April 25, 1812.

There may be some others, but my reference to these is merely to suggest the nature of part of the information which it is probable may be desired by Congress in relation to the Floridas, and which, it is hoped, your position will enable you to furnish. I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, April 2, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th ultimo, together with its enclosures, viz: two commissions; copy of the treaty; law for executing it (in a newspaper); Colonel Forbes's instructions; royal order for delivery; translation of same; form of proclamation.

In pursuance of the instructions of the President, as communicated through you, I shall proceed, as soon as practicable, to Montpelier, via New Orleans, there to await the necessary information from Colonel Forbes, and shall immediately, upon receiving it, take possession of Pensacola, and proceed to organize the Government agreeably to the instructions. I hope to be able to leave this by the 15th instant, and to arrive at Montpelier by the 1st of May.

I have, agreeably to instructions, appointed Brevet Major General Gaines to receive possession of St. Augustine, and by the southern mail have forwarded him the necessary instructions for that purpose.

There is one subject which, at this early period, I wish, through you, to call the attention of the President to, and receive your instructions thereon. It is the situation of that part of the Creek Indians who in the late war abandoned their own country and fled to the Floridas, and continued hostilities against the United States until conquered in 1818. During that campaign, I ordered the conquered Indians above the Florida line, and directed them to settle down within their own limits (the Creek nation.) I have lately, however, understood that McQueen and his adherents have made a settlement at Mickasuky, and also on the Suwanee river. Are these Indians to be ordered up to the Creek country, there to settle themselves, or are they to be protected in their new settlement? I have only to remark that the country set apart for the Creek nation is sufficient for the support of all, and that, by removing those within Florida, greater security will be given to our frontier, and the Government would more certainly be enabled to prevent smuggling, which, no doubt, will be attempted to a considerable extent, through the various inlets in the country now inhabited by them. Whatever may be the President's instructions upon this subject shall be strictly obeyed, and likewise in relation to the negroes who have run away from the States, and inhabit this country, and are protected by the Indians.

With sentiments of esteem and regard, I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, April 10, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 23d ultimo, and have perused with attention the instructions contained therein. The second article of the treaty, in which it is stipulated that the Territories of East and West Florida, and the fortifications within the same, are ceded and are to be delivered to the United States, is so clear and explicit, that it had never occurred to my mind that an attempt would be made by the Spanish authorities to strip the fortifications of their means of defence. Cannon is an indispensable appendage of a fortification, and the term fortification is always understood to include every thing appertaining to a work constructed for defence. Indeed, such was my view of that article of the treaty, that I should have considered the Spanish Government bound by their cession of the fortifications with the territory to pass over to the United States, not only the fortifications, but the ordnance and munitions of war contained therein.

If, on my arrival at Pensacola, any difficulty should arise on this subject, I will avail myself of your very just suggestions, and will endeavor, as forcibly as I can, to impress the Governor with a sense of the liberal construction which the United States are disposed to give to the treaty. In any event, you may rest assured that your instructions will be most promptly attended to.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, April 24, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I sail from this place to-day, at one o'clock, P. M. I have despatched my aid-de-camp, Captain Call, to Montpelier, with instructions to receive the communications from Colonel Forbes, in the event of his arrival before I reach that place, and to place the troops destined for the occupation of Pensacola in a state of readiness to march at a moment's warning. I hope to reach Montpelier by the 1st of next month, should I not be detained at Orleans for the want of a vessel to transport me to Montpelier. I am, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NEW ORLEANS, April 24, 1821.

SIR: On the evening of the 22d instant I reached this city on my way to Montpelier, and will, if I can procure a transport, proceed on my journey on the 26th instant.

Immediately on my arrival, Mr. Fromentin waited upon me, and produced a commission dated in the year 1819, authorizing him to receive the Floridas, together with the archives at Pensacola and St. Augustine. He appears to be impressed with a belief that, although that part of his commission to receive the Floridas was superseded, yet, as the Executive had been silent on the subject of the archives to be received at Pensacola, &c., that he, with my approval, was entitled to the safe keeping of them. From the tenor of my instructions, I do not conceive that I can create any office in the Floridas that does not exist there at present, and that clerks of any kind except those that are contemplated under my instruction to translate and transcribe the archives for the information of the President, cannot be necessary until the next meeting of Congress. However, should the President be of opinion that a safe keeper of the archives should be necessary, and that Mr. Fromentin should be appointed to that trust, and express the same to me, with the salary to be annexed, I will immediately notify Mr. Fromentin thereof, and request his removal to Pensacola. But it does not appear to me that there can arise a necessity for any individual to have a copy of any of the records before the meeting of the next Congress. I shall, therefore, not make any appointment of this kind until I hear from the President on the subject.

I have here met with Major Stanton, of the Quartermaster's department, who advises me that he is without Quartermaster's funds for the purpose of carrying into effect the transportation of the civil and military officers of Spain from the Floridas, as stipulated under the late treaty with Spain; and informs me that it is understood by the Quartermaster General that through me the funds necessary to carry into effect the stipulation for transporting the Spanish troops are to be obtained. From the perusal of my instructions, it does not appear that I am authorized to draw upon the State Department for Quartermaster's funds, but will take upon me the responsibility so to do. I thought it most advisable to endeavor to raise here, by a draft upon your Department, the sum necessary to meet the expenses of receiving the country and organizing the Government, fearing that a draft would not be sold at Mobile or Pensacola. For this purpose, I offered for sale a draft, and found I could not obtain United States paper for it without a discount. I therefore directed Major Stanton to apply to the Branch Bank of the United States, to be informed whether it would advance upon my draft. It refused. I then addressed a note to the collector, Mr. Chew: the enclosed is his answer. I also enclose the statement of Major Stanton; from all which you will discover that, without a discount, money cannot be obtained here on drafts upon the Government. No delay, however, shall occur in the transportation of the Spanish troops from the want of funds, as far as I can command them; nor will I ever consent to sell bills on the Government at a discount to any, and more particularly to the Branch Bank of the United States, in which is deposited all the revenue of the Government received at this place. I shall endeavor, at Mobile or Pensacola, to raise the necessary funds on drafts. Should I fail there, I trust, upon the receipt of this, the Government will instruct the Branch Bank to furnish me with the amount that may be necessary to meet the expenses that may occur in receiving the Floridas, and organizing the Government thereof. I am, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

NEW ORLEANS, April 25, 1821.

SIR: Agreeably to your request of this morning, I waited on the cashier of the United States Branch Bank, and stated to him your wish to negotiate, through his bank, a draft on Washington for ten or fifteen thousand dollars, which he peremptorily declined doing. Knowing the importance of obtaining funds, and that money could not be had in market for drafts but at a discount, I ventured to state to the cashier such reasons as suggested themselves to my mind why the favor requested should be granted, and the very serious embarrassment that might result to the public service should he persist in his refusal; which, however, he thought proper to do, without assigning any other reason than that the instructions of the mother bank forbade his negotiating drafts.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Collector at New Orleans to Governor Jackson,

APRIL 26, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and should have been extremely happy to be empowered to advance the sum you require, by accepting a draft on the Department of State; but particular instructions from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury will be necessary to authorize me to make that disposition of the public money in my hands.

I am, &c.

BEVERLY CHEW.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

BLAKELY, ALABAMA, May 1, 1821.

SIR: I arrived at this place on the morning of the 29th ultimo, and immediately communicated with Montpelier by express, which returned last evening with information that no advices had been received there from Colonel Forbes.

Being informed that associations exist for the purpose of introducing a number of Africans into Florida before the change of Government, and for this purpose an agent from Baltimore, and another from the East are now, the one in Pensacola, and the other in Cuba or Bahama islands, to obtain possession of the ceded country as soon as possible, and thereby prevent the furtherance of this dreaded evil, I have this morning despatched Doctor Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge with communications from the Governor of Pensacola, copies of which I send you herewith, marked Nos. 1 and 2, and also with instructions to inquire into the truth of a complaint made to me in New Orleans, and reiterated here, that the Spanish subjects in Pensacola are in the habit constantly of pulling down the houses of non-resident Americans for fuel.

My aid-de-camp, Captain Call, whom I sent from Nashville over land to Montpelier, has not reached that place, owing, it is believed, to the unusual freshets prevalent in the upper country. This will detain me here until the arrival of my horses, and until the return of the gentlemen whom I have sent to Pensacola.

I have directed Colonel Brook, in command at Montpelier, to forward to this place all communications which may be received at Montpelier for me.

As soon as I hear from the Governor of Pensacola I will communicate to you his reply.

I have signified to Commodore Patterson the propriety of sending a vessel to take a reconnaissance of the Florida coast as far as Tampa bay, to intercept any American vessel laden in whole or in part with Africans.

From conversing with Major Stanton, of the Quartermaster's department, on the subject of supplies for the Spanish officers and soldiers on their voyage to Cuba, and the inconvenience of preparing their bread on board, I have directed him to order Captain Rogers, of the commissariat department at New Orleans, to have a sufficient quantity of sea biscuit prepared for their supply. In this arrangement there will be a saving of tonnage to the United States, and it will have the happy effect of preventing any complaints from Spain on the score of supplies, or as to the liberality of the Government of the United States in their construction of the treaty. I hope this measure will meet the approbation of the President.

With high consideration and respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

southern division, and my friend, and one of my private secretaries, Judge Brackenridge, will present you this letter; they are the bearers of a communication to you on the subject of a treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, and also of all the documents with which I have been furnished to authorize me to receive possession of the Floridas. These gentlemen are authorized by me to receive any communication you may be pleased to make in relation to the necessary arrangements for the transportation of the officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty, or to such other subjects as you may think necessary, preparatory to the surrender of the Floridas, according to the stipulations of the treaty.

No. 2.

MONTPELIER, April 30, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your Excellency that I have been duly commissioned by the President of the United States to receive possession of the Floridas, agreeably to the stipulations of the late treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty. I have also to state that Colonel James G. Forbes has sailed from New York to Havana, charged with the royal order to the Captain General for the delivery of the countries ceded to the United States by the said treaty, and that he is to communicate to me from Pensacola immediately on his arrival, which may be daily expected.

Being desirous, in order to avoid all unnecessary delay, to have in readiness, on the arrival of Colonel Forbes from Cuba, the necessary transports for the civil and military officers, and the troops of His Catholic Majesty, agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty, as well as for their supplies, according to the liberal construction which the President is disposed to give to the treaty, I have to request you to inform me of the number of officers and troops to be transported from Pensacola and St. Mark's, and also of the number of days in which the passage from Pensacola to Havana is usually performed. As the transports and supplies will be procured at New Orleans, you will be pleased to inform me what length of time will be necessary, on your part, after the arrival of the order from the Captain General, to enable you to make the necessary preparations to embark. This information is requested, in order that I may have every thing in a state of preparation for your transportation the moment you are ready. It is also important to enable me to have the necessary supplies transported to Pensacola and St. Mark's, and in depots, for the troops which are to occupy the Floridas.

It being communicated to me that it is expected, from the assurance of the Minister of His Catholic Majesty at Washington, that no unnecessary delay will take place in delivering possession of the Floridas, I have ordered the supplies of the troops of the United States to be forwarded to Pensacola and St. Augustine, and they are expected to arrive at those points by the 15th of the next month. The situation of my troops in the interior, and the difficulty of supplying them there, render this step necessary; and orders have been given to expedite no further supplies to the places which those troops at present occupy. A removal of them at an early day is, therefore, rendered necessary, and I have no disposition (unless urged by necessity) to move my troops to any garrison occupied by the troops of His Catholic Majesty, until the same shall be evacuated, being, I assure you, earnestly desirous that nothing may occur to disturb that harmony and good understanding which at present so happily exists between our respective Governments, and the citizens and subjects of each.

From a wish to maintain the most perfect harmony and good understanding between us during our correspondence, I have charged the bearers of this communication, Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, surgeon general of the southern division, and my friend, and one of my private secretaries, Judge Brackenridge, to make known to you the sincere desire, on my part, to carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty and the surrender of the Floridas with the utmost good faith and amity with the officers of His Catholic Majesty, as well as the promptness with which every thing stipulated under the treaty, on the part of the Government of the United States, will be executed, agreeably to the most liberal construction of that instrument.

I am, sir, with sentiments of respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

From Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

BLAKELY, May 7, 1821.

SIR: In my letter of the 1st instant I advised you of my arrival here, of communicating with Montpelier, and, hearing nothing from Colonel Forbes, of my sending Doctor Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to obtain information necessary to be had before I gave instructions to Major Stanton, quartermaster, to provide the transports and supplies necessary for the transportation of the Spanish officers and soldiers. These gentlemen have this morning returned. The enclosed translation of a letter from the Governor of Pensacola, and the report of these gentlemen, will give you the information acquired, and may not be uninteresting to you.

Finding, from the report of the above gentlemen, that the Hornet had reached the Havana on the 9th ultimo, and believing that she must reach Pensacola shortly, and reflecting that it is better for the transports to be ready with supplies, and to wait for the Hornet, than for the Spanish officers and troops to wait for the transports to be procured after her arrival, I have ordered Major Stanton to repair to Orleans and procure the transports and supplies, and have them ready to sail for Pensacola on the first notice of the arrival of the Hornet there. Major Stanton informs me that he thinks vessels can be obtained on much better terms now than they can be after it is known the Hornet has returned, and that transportation must be immediately had. He is instructed to make the most advantageous contract he can, to save any demurrage on account of any short delay; and I have no doubt, from the rumors of mercantile associations to introduce large quantities of goods into Pensacola, that there will be a great saving to the United States by having the transports ready on the arrival of the Hornet, as well as earlier possession of the ceded country.

It is all-important for the health of our troops to have them removed from Fort Gadsden in all this month, or early in the next, and every exertion, as far as it rests with me, shall be used to obtain this object. I am at a loss to conjecture the causes of the delay of the Hornet; a few days will give us the reason, and I hope it may not be found to exist in any understanding existing between an association of our merchants and the Governor General of Cuba; but it is rumored and believed here that such an attempt will be made by merchants to prevail upon the Governor General to withhold the order for the delivery of the Floridas until the last moment, to give time for the arrival of large shipments of goods for Pensacola. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Report of Dr. Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to Governor Jackson.

BLAKELY, May 7, 1821.

SIR: In pursuance of your instructions, we left this place on Tuesday morning, and reached Pensacola about 10 o'clock the Thursday following. The Hornet was not there, but, from information on which we believe reliance can be placed, she arrived at Havana on the 9th ultimo.

We immediately addressed a note (A) to the Governor, enclosing our letter of introduction, and requesting an interview as soon as it would be convenient. He sent us a polite answer, (B,) inviting us to wait on him at the Government-house at 10 o'clock the following morning, the 4th inst. At the hour appointed we waited on him, and presented the communication from you, of which we were the bearers, and which, being explained to him, he observed that, on the subject of the treaty, he was only subordinate to the Captain General of the island of Cuba; that, as nothing had been communicated to him from his superior, he had no authority to enter into any arrangements respecting it; that he could do nothing until he should receive his orders through the regular and proper channel. He declared his wish to avoid all unnecessary delay, and to act with the utmost promptitude the moment he should receive his orders from the Captain General. We observed to him that this information was requested in order to prevent useless delay, to enable you with greater certainty to provide the transports and supplies, and offered to show him the copy of the royal order, and other papers in our possession. We reminded him of the situation of the troops of the United States in the interior, intended to occupy the post within the Floridas; the approach of the sickly season; the difficulties of all military movements by land and sea, in this climate, after the months of May and June. He repeated that he had no authority whatever to take any step, until authorized by the Captain General; declined the perusal of the royal order, but declared his willingness to communicate fully all the information required by you, the moment of the arrival of the order from Havana. We then requested him to communicate in writing to you what he had stated to us, which he promised to do. We received his reply (E) in the evening, and next morning set out for this place, where we arrived this morning. Previously to our departure from Pensacola, we addressed a letter (C) to the Governor, expressing our regret at not being able to obtain the information which we sought, and enclosing a letter (D) to Colonel Forbes, making known your arrival, and stating your anxiety to obtain possession of the Floridas as speedily as possible.

With respect to the points on which we were instructed to obtain information, the following is the result of our inquiries and observation: The number of troops, including officers and persons connected with the Government, who will leave the country, does not exceed five hundred and fifty; two hundred of these are in Pensacola, the remainder at the Barrancas and St. Mark's. Every thing seems to indicate the prevailing understanding that they are shortly to quit the country. The troops are not regularly drilled; there are no morning or evening parades; the public buildings are entirely neglected; and the Government seems to be carelessly administered; the inhabitants are impatient for the change, and it is said that but few of the Spanish families will leave the place. The Governor, we were told, is personally desirous to be gone; he is a frank, candid soldier, and we have no doubt that any difficulties or delays which may occur will be occasioned by the Captain General.

There are at present in the harbor only a few coasting vessels; there have been but few arrivals, and we are satisfied, from every thing we have observed, that the accounts which we have received respecting the importation of Africans is not correct; if any such traffic be carried on, it is much more likely to be between Havana and St. Augustine. On the other subject respecting which we were directed to make inquiry, the injury said to be done by the soldiery to the untenanted houses belonging to American citizens, we find that such injury has been done alike to the buildings of Spanish subjects. Nearly all the houses of this place are in a state of dilapidation, and there are nearly one-half unoccupied, few of which can be inhabited without extensive repairs. Nearly every dwelling, however, has been taken by persons who are waiting with impatience the change of Government. Rents have risen astonishingly within a few weeks, and town property is now as high as it probably will be, excepting in particular situations, for some time to come. Nearly all the public squares, the ground around the block-houses, estimated at a very large amount, is claimed as private property, it having been sold by the order of the King, as we are informed, some years ago. It is a subject, however, very well worth inquiring into. We suspect there is a great deal of very valuable public property in and about Pensacola.

From the shortness of our stay, it was not in our power to obtain information on other subjects, and on those we have noticed not as full as we have wished.

We have the honor to be, &c.

SIR: We do ourselves the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's reply to the communication of which we were the bearers from Major General Jackson, commanding the southern division of the United States Army, and commissioner for receiving the Floridas.

We regret that your Excellency does not consider yourself authorized to communicate the information solicited, as it was extremely desirable, for the reasons which had been urged. An exact knowledge of the number of persons for whom transports are to be furnished, and the necessary supply of provisions, would have very much facilitated the arrangements on the part of the United States. It will, however, be gratifying to General Jackson to receive your Excellency's reply, on the arrival of Colonel James G. Forbes with the order from the Captain General of Cuba for the delivery of the Floridas, and to whom we have addressed the enclosed letter, which we take the liberty of requesting your Excellency to deliver immediately upon his arrival at this place. We have requested Colonel Forbes to receive any communication your Excellency may be pleased to make to General Jackson, and to forward the same, together with his own despatches.

Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge to Colonel James G. Forbes.

PENSACOLA, May 4, 1821.

DEAR SIR: General Jackson arrived at Blakely on the 29th ultimo, and immediately sent an express to Montpelier, in expectation of meeting with despatches from you at that place. On the return of the express, he thought proper, from his great anxiety to comply with the wish of the President to obtain possession of the Floridas early in this month, to send us with a communication to the Governor of Pensacola, requesting the necessary information, to enable him to have provided the transports and provisions for the Spanish officers and soldiers, and also to communicate with you, calculating upon your having arrived. We were much disappointed at not finding the Hornet at this place, but immediately requested an interview with the Governor, which we obtained the day following. He informed us that he could make no arrangements, or say any thing on the subject, until he received his orders through the Captain General of the Island of Cuba, to whom he is subordinate. We were therefore disappointed in obtaining for the present the information which General Jackson desires; the Governor promised, however, to communicate it fully, by express, as soon as you should arrive. General Jackson expected to have every thing in readiness by the fifteenth of this month, to transport the Spanish troops are expected at this place and St. Augustine troops to Havana. The supplies for the American by that day, and orders have been given to discontinue the supplies at the points which those troops at present occupy. The engagement of transports at New Orleans, and the purchase of supplies, must be delayed until the information requested by the General shall be obtained. The situation of the troops in the interior renders it very important that they should be removed without a moment's delay.

We therefore request you to receive the Governor's answer to General Jackson's communication, and to forward it with your own despatches for the General with the utmost possible expedition. He is extremely anxious to avoid all delay, as the season is now far advanced, and many reasons concur in rendering it necessary to take immediate possession of the Floridas.

We have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. BRONAUGH,
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

Governor Callava to General Jackson.

PENSACOLA, May 4, 1821.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: In the morning of the day before yesterday I received your Excellency's letter, dated at Montpelier, the 30th of April last, by which you are pleased to inform me that Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, Surgeon General of the Division of the South, and one of your private secretaries, Judge Brackenridge, are the bearers of a communication to me on the subject of the treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, and also of the documents in virtue of which you have been empowered to receive possession of the Floridas; that the said Bronaugh and Brackenridge were authorized by you to receive any reply which I might think proper to make touching the necessary arrangements preparatory to the surrender of the Floridas, according to the stipulations. [Here follows a mere recapitulation of the letter of which Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge were the bearers.] In reply, I have to inform your Excellency that, at the present moment, I cannot enter into the particulars which are suggested to me, not having yet received any orders from the Captain General of Cuba, the superior on whom I am immediately dependant, relative to the treaty and the surrender of this province, and by which my measures must be governed, in case I should be selected as the person to make the same. Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge have requested that I would advise you of the arrival of the Hornet as soon as she may arrive at this port, which I consented to do with much pleasure.

I have the honor to declare how satisfactory to me are the sentiments you express, and I take this occasion to reciprocate the offer of my most sincere services.

I am, with the highest consideration, &c.

JOSE CALLAVA.

MONTPELIER, May 19, 1821.

SIR: I am still without any information from Colonel Forbes, or from the Hornet, since her arrival on the 9th ultimo at the Havana, of which you were advised in my last. Her delay is unaccountable, and places us in an unpleasant situation.

It certainly was, from the treaty, the expectation of both Governments that we would have been in full possession of the Floridas before the 22d instant. The situation of the troops on the Appalachicola, in the interior, and which are to garrison St. Mark's, is unpleasant, and the delay will add much to the expense of transporting provisions to them, especially as they are again to be transported to St. Mark's. Believing, as I do, that, as soon as the Spanish agents are notified of the ratification of the treaty, and the exchange thereof, there can be no reason for delay, the moment the Hornet arrives I shall move to Pensacola, and, having taken possession, shall organize and exercise the Government of the country, as a thing which we have a perfect right to do at any time. The evacuation of the fortifications by the Spanish officers and troops, and the transporting them to Cuba, is another thing, to accomplish which they have six months, if it is not possible to withdraw them sooner.

Here, from my instructions, I am to remain until the arrival of Colonel Forbes; but, on his arrival, if any delay is attempted, it cannot be attributed to the Government of Spain, but a wanton act of her officers, not warranted by good faith or by the treaty. In this case, therefore, I have a right to present myself and demand possession. This course I intend to pursue, if necessary; and my conjectures that this course may become necessary grow out of the delay of the arrival of Colonel Forbes. From reading his instructions, I cannot see any real cause for his delay, or how it has occurred, or why he has permitted it; still, I hope he has good reasons to satisfy his Government in this particular.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extract of a letter from same to same, dated

MONTPELIER, May 21, 1821.

On last evening Mr. G. L. Thompson reached me, having left the Hornet at Cuba on the 7th instant, and handed me a letter from Colonel Forbes, a copy of which is herewith enclosed. Mr. Thompson informs me that Colonel Forbes had assured him that he would not be detained more than four days at furthest, and stated to him that he had this positive assurance from the Governor General of Cuba.

I sincerely regret the delay of Colonel Forbes, as, on his arrival, I am prepared to present myself and receive possession of the country, and put an end to this barbarous traffic, [slave trade,] which I have no doubt is now practising on the coast of Florida.

I advised you in a former letter that I had sent bills on the Government, by Colonel Gadsden, to the amount of $3,000, to be sold in Orleans. I am advised by him that he could not effect a sale of them, and that he was compelled to raise money to enable him to procure the necessary transports for Major Stanton from other sources, of which you will be advised hereafter. Unless the Government furnishes me with a check upon the Branch Bank of the United States at Orleans, I am fearful that I shall not be able to proceed well in the organization of the Government.

I enclose you a copy of a letter from the Governor of Pensacola, received by my aid-de-camp, (Captain Call,) together with a copy of his report, which will show you the feelings of the Governor, and that nothing is wanting but the arrival of Colonel Forbes to place us in possession of the ceded country. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Copy of a letter from Colonel J. G. Forbes to Major Gen. Andrew Jackson.

HAVANA, May 7, 1821.

SIR: Commissioned by the President of the United States to deliver the royal order upon the Governor of Cuba for the delivery of the Floridas to our Government, I was directed by the honorable Secretary of State to communicate with your Excellency upon my arrival at Pensacola with the further order of the Governor to the Spanish authorities in the Floridas.

I arrived in the Hornet sloop of war on the 22d of last month, and was very favorably received by Governor Mahy, who expressed a wish to expedite me very promptly, as soon as the convoy for Spain sailed. This assurance has been renewed to me occasionally since, but I regret to say that I am still uncertain when I can receive either the necessary order, or the archives, which also come within the range of my commission.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by Mr. Thompson of making this communication, and take the liberty of suggesting to your Excellency the expediency of having a person at Pensacola from whom I can, on landing, receive such information as will enable me to communicate immediately with your Excellency by express.

I beg leave also to state that I have applied for an order, in duplicate form, so as to embrace East Florida, and that, on receipt of it, I shall endeavor to find a suitable opportunity of transmitting it to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia Island, subject to such orders as he may receive from the Department of State, or from your Excellency, taking the original with me in the Hornet.

As Mr. Thompson is fully acquainted with the nature of my mission, I refer your Excellency to him for any further information, with the assurance that no exertions have been, or shall on my part be, spared, to carry into complete effect the objects of such national importance.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.,

JAMES G. FORBES,
Commissary and Agent of the U. S.

Report of Captain Call to General Jackson.

MONTPELIER, May 21, 1821.

GENERAL: In obedience to your instructions of the 11th, I left this on the 13th, and arrived at Pensacola on the 14th instant. The result of my mission to which place I have now the honor to report.

On my arrival I addressed a note to the Governor, of which No. 1 is a copy, and received in reply No. 2, herewith enclosed. On the 15th I had an interview with the Governor, delivered your letter of the 11th, and received for answer No. 3, which I have presented to you, and from which you will find that the Governor has acceded to your proposition, so far as it relates to your making a deposite of provisions at Pensacola, to facilitate which he has offered a public store-house, and a guard for its protection. But he expresses much regret that he is not authorized to withdraw the garrison of St. Mark's until he receives the orders of the Captain General of Cuba to that effect. He pledges himself that every exertion in his power shall be made to carry the treaty into immediate operation; and that, when ordered by the Captain General, every facility on his part shall be given to the American authorities for the most prompt occupation of the ceded territory. I had repeated interviews with the Governor, and, as far as I had an opportunity of forming an opinion of his character, I believe him to be a frank, ingenuous soldier, and that every confidence may be placed in the professions which he has made. Of this I am sure—he is not less anxious to leave than you are to occupy the ceded country. For information relative to the sloop of war Hornet, I refer you to Mr. Thompson, who left her in the port of Havana on the 9th instant.

I am, sir, &c.

R. K. CALL, A. D. C.

No. 1.

Captain Call to Governor Callava.

PENSACOLA, May 14, 1821.

Captain Call of the United States Army, presents his respects to Don Jose Callava, Governor of West Florida, and informs him that he is the bearer of a communication from Major General Jackson to his Excellency, with whom Captain Call requests the pleasure of an interview.

No. 2.

Answer to the above.

PENSACOLA, May 14, 1821.

His Excellency Governor Callava has just received Captain Call's note. He presents his respects to him, and informs him that he may have the interview which he requests at ten o'clock tomorrow morning, in the Government-house.

No. 3.

Copy of a letter from the Governor of West Florida to General Andrew Jackson.

PENSACOLA, May 16, 1821.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I received yesterday morning, with much satisfaction, by the hands of Captain Richard K. Call, your Excellency's aid, your communication of the 11th, in reply to mine of the 4th instant.

I am persuaded that I stated to Judge Brackenridge, in the interview with me, and on the delivery of your first communication, that your Excellency would find no obstacle to the depositing at this place the supplies to which you refer, and on this occasion I have given the same assurance to Captain Call.

The suggestion of your Excellency respecting the transportation of the Spanish garrison of St. Mark's to this place, in order that, united with the rest, they may sail together under the convoy of the Hornet, is as worthy of your Excellency's prudence as it is necessary and proper, and I shall contribute to it with pleasure (as soon as the expected orders shall arrive from the Captain General) as far as may be in my power, and with the activity and energy necessary to prevent the inconveniences which may be occasioned by delay. I regret that, at present, this is not within the compass of my authority, those orders not having yet arrived.

I hope your Excellency will do me the honor to be fully persuaded that I heartily concur with you in wishing that every thing between us may be conducted with the utmost harmony and friendship; as, also, of the satisfaction which your sentiments have given to the officers and troops under my charge, as well as to myself.

As soon as I shall be empowered to enter on the subject of the evacuation of this province, I will transmit to your Excellency, with the utmost punctuality, the information requested of me, and whatever else may contribute to the more satisfactory accomplishment of the business. Captain Call shall receive from me all the respect and attentions due to him, as well on account of his individual worth, as of the pleasure I take in honoring your Excellency's recommendation.

God preserve you many years.

JOSE CALLAVA.

• Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

MONTPELIER, May 30, 1821.

SIR: In my letter to you of the 21st instant, I advised you of the arrival of Mr. Thompson, and the receipt of a letter from Colonel Forbes, a copy of which I enclosed to you, and which I hope will reach you in due time.

I have had no information from Colonel Forbes since my last, but it appears to be understood and expressed by the inhabitants of Pensacola that we will not get possession until the expiration of six months from the exchange of ratifications of the treaty. My letter of the 19th instant will have given you my construction of the treaty, and my power under the commission to take possession of the Floridas, combined with your instructions. I shall anxiously await your answer to that letter, as I have but little doubt now but we will experience every delay that can be thrown in our way, and I have no wish to do any act contrary to my instructions or the wish of my Government; but when I review the delays and conduct heretofore practised by the Spanish Government, I feel myself bound to oppose any attempt to prostrate our national character, and to violate the pledges of friendship given in the treaty. I feel every desire to harmonize and to obtain possession of the country ceded in the most gentle manner, provided I meet a corresponding disposition on the part of the officers of Spain; but if the order for the delivery should not be sent by Colonel Forbes to the Governor of Pensacola, on his report that he has delivered the royal order to the Captain General and Governor of Cuba, I deem it imperious upon me to advance within the limits of Florida, tender sufficient transportation, and demand a surrender of the country, agreeably to the second article of the treaty; it being presumed that the Governor General of Cuba has done his duty, and that, duly notifying the Governor, he has given the necessary order for the delivery of the ceded country. If the Governor alleges that he is not ready to deliver the country and embark his troops, it seems to me that he is not only bound to show good reasons, but also to defray the expenses of demurrage incurred upon the public vessels ordered for the transportation of his troops. If the Spanish Governor should not embark his troops before the 22d of August next, must not the Spanish Government, after that date, furnish their own transportation, having violated the treaty? and have I not a right, after that date, to take possession by force, if not peaceably surrendered? From the wording of the act of Congress, I have no doubt we have.

I hope I may be agreeably disappointed in my forebodings; but, from the declarations of some Americans that we will not get, nor have a right to demand, possession until the expiration of the six months, and that even then we must negotiate for possession, added to the delay already experienced, I am induced to believe that every delay will be experienced that the Spanish officers think will be submitted to by the American Government. Be assured I shall act with caution, but with firmness and energy. I cherish a hope that the officers of Spain may meet me harmoniously; and, although appearances are at present to the reverse, I still believe they think that I will act promptly, and that they will be thereby induced not to hazard too much by unnecessary delay. I shall wait with anxiety for your answer to my letter of the 19th instant. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extracts of a letter from Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State, dated

MONTPELIER, June 9, 1821.

I am still here awaiting the arrival of Colonel Forbes, from whom I have heard nothing since the receipt of his letter of the 7th May last. As I advised you, Major Stanton has engaged the transports, and they will be in Pensacola bay on the 10th instant, unless adverse winds prevent. They were to sail from Orleans on the 3d instant.

It was calculated with certainty that Colonel Forbes would have been here long since. Should he permit himself to be much longer detained, the demurrage on the transports here and at Amelia Island will be a heavy item in our expense, and occasion us to lose many soldiers by removing them in the height of the sickly season; for, sir, to be candid, I have now no hopes of his arriving here before the latter end of this month, or perhaps the 22d of August. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

P. S. 9 o'clock P. M.—A letter from Pensacola states that a gentleman just arrived from the Havana states that the Intendant died on the 19th ultimo, and Captain Read lay very ill. By Lieutenant Hawkins, from Mobile, I am informed that a captain of a vessel from Havana stated to him that Captain Read, of the Hornet, was dead. No account of Colonel Forbes.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

CANTONMENT, MONTPELIER,
June 10, 1821.

SIR: The mail is just passing, and I have only time to say that an express reached this from Pensacola, one hour since, bringing the information of the arrival of the Hornet at that place yesterday. We shall move from this on the 14th instant, and hope to be in possession of the Floridas as early after that date as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

MONTPELIER, June 11, 1821.

SIR: My note of yesterday, sent by express after the post rider, will have advised you of the arrival of the Hornet at Pensacola on the evening of the 9th instant. The communication of Colonel Forbes to you, enclosed to me for perusal, with a request to forward the same as early as practicable, will afford you all the information I yet possess on the subject. There can now be no cause for delay in delivering the provinces of Florida, conformably to the stipulations of the treaty, unless it should arise from the error committed in designating Colonel Forbes, in the Captain General of Cuba's order, as United States Commissioner authorized to receive the ceded country, and which error appears not to have been corrected on the note attached to the order addressed to the Governor of West Florida, as Spanish commissioner.

Colonel Forbes has not made known to me the causes which detained him after the receipt of the Captain General's order for the delivery of the provinces, which bears date the 5th of May, 1821; and it is unaccountable how it should have required until the 28th of the same month for the two notes to be annexed, which are dated on that day.

By reference to Colonel Forbes's letter to you of the 8th instant, it appears that Don Alva, his Spanish colleague, is alone charged with the delivery of East Florida. Should this prove to be the fact, considerable delay and embarrassment may result, as the only public vessel on this station (the Nonsuch) was despatched from Havana to St. Augustine by Colonel Forbes, with the supposed commissioner, Arredondo, for the delivering the province of East Florida to the constituted authorities of the United States.

If Don Alva's presence in St. Augustine be indispensable, it is uncertain when he may be able to reach that place; nor do I conceive that, under the treaty, the United States is bound to furnish him with transportation. It is my intention to send Colonel Gadsden to St. Augustine as soon as possession is obtained of Pensacola, and I have applied to the collector of the port of Mobile for the revenue cutter Alabama for this purpose. Should this vessel be obtained, a passage will be offered Don Alva. I can only assure you that, guided by your instructions, no further delay in obtaining possession of the Floridas will be permitted. I do not anticipate any, unless it should grow out of the detention of Don Alva at Pensacola. I am advised by Colonel Butler that the transports were at Charleston on the 9th ultimo, and must have reached Amelia Island by the 15th. All necessary arrangements connected with the occupation of West Florida have been matured. The transports were to have sailed, with Major Stanton on board, from New Orleans on the 3d instant, and their arrival in Pensacola may be expected daily. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

MONTPELIER, June 13, 1821.

SIR: Your communications of the 22d and 23d ultimo, accompanied with a list of appointments made by the Executive, with a view of establishing and enforcing the revenue laws of the United States within the Territories of East and West Florida, conformably to the act of Congress for the government of said provinces, were received late last night by express. They have been placed on file, and their contents duly noted.

With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

MANUEL'S, (15 miles from Pensacola,)

June 29, 1821.

SIR: I arrived here on the 15th instant, since which I have been employed in making the necessary arrangements for receiving possession of West Florida, &c., and have the honor to inform you that every thing is now in readiness but a vessel, to supply the place of the transport Cora, which was chartered by Major Stanton at New Orleans, and unfortunately lost off the Balize in a heavy gale on her way to Pensacola. Another transport could only be procured at New Orleans, and it was confidently expected that Quartermaster Hunt, stationed at that place, would have chartered another vessel, and despatched her here immediately upon hearing of the loss of the Cora; but this responsibility it appears he did not think proper to assume, although he must have received information of her loss shortly after the accident, and no step was taken to supply another until the arrival of Major Stanton's express, who was despatched to Orleans the instant that a vessel could be procured to transport him, after the information of her loss reached Pensacola. The winds have been unfavorable, but the arrival of the transport I think cannot be delayed more than a day or two, and immediately after I shall receive possession; as I have the pledge of the Governor that, in four days, or six at furthest, after the arrival of the transport, he will deliver formally the keys of Pensacola to me.

Some difficulty was likely to have occurred in relation to the artillery appertaining to the fortifications. The Governor contended that he had the right to take them away, as they were not specifically ceded under the second article of the treaty. I claimed them as being included under the term fortifications, and urged that it might be considered a violation of the treaty if an attempt should be made to strip the fortifications of their means of defence, and instanced the case of a vessel of war transferred from one nation to another, which might as well be stripped of her armament by the party disposing of her, as to remove from a fortification its guns mounted for its defence, which would entirely change its character, and reduce it to a mere edifice. He, however, at length agreed that an inventory should be taken of ordnance stores, &c., and the subject be referred to our respective Governments, they remaining in the possession of the officers of the United States until the question should be decided. Immediately upon claim being set up to the ordnance, and a receipt being demanded for it, as in deposit, I demanded a receipt for the provisions, and likewise for the transportation which would be furnished for the civil officers, and families of officers, which were not specifically enumerated under the seventh article of the treaty. This also has been agreed to, and is to be referred in like manner to our Governments. So soon as I receive possession of the country, I will submit to you all the correspondence which has taken place on this subject, and also a full report of all my proceedings adopted in relation to the occupancy of the Floridas.

In justice to Major Stanton, I must add that no blame can possibly be attached to him for the loss of the transport Cora, he having used every necessary precaution to ascertain that she was seaworthy, as he had been ordered by me to employ no vessel unless he was satisfied that she was such. His report, together with certificates, &c., which fully prove that he faithfully performed his duty, shall be furnished you.

The unlooked-for delay of the Hornet, in the first place; the extraordinary occurrence of Don Alva bringing with him to Pensacola a despatch to the Governor of East Florida, which the Governor of West Florida yesterday assured me was from the Captain General of Cuba, and relates to the delivery of East Florida, when the United States vessel Nonsuch, at the request of Colonel Forbes, was ordered from Havana direct to St. Augustine, together with the delay which has necessarily [been] occasioned by the loss of the transport Cora, will add to our expense in obtaining possession of the Floridas. And, to prevent any further delay from the circumstance of Don Alva having brought to this place despatches for the Governor of St. Augustine, and to insure immediate possession, Colonel Gadsden will sail tomorrow in the United States schooner Revenge, which fortunately touched on yesterday at Pensacola, taking with him the necessary orders to Colonel Butler, and offering to carry the despatch to the Governor of East Florida.

I was fortunate enough to obtain from Colonel Gadsden the sum of four thousand seven hundred and twenty dollars, for which I have given him duplicate drafts, as per letter of advice.

I have had much writing in answering the letters of the Governor of Pensacola, which has engrossed all my time, and given great labor to my translators. I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, July 17, 1821.

SIR: Mine of the 29th June advised you of the occurrences to that date. I have now to inform you that, at 10 o'clock of this day, the province of West Florida, with its dependencies, &c., was delivered to me in due form by Don Jose Callava, the commissioner on the part of the King of Spain.

I shall take the earliest opportunity to communicate the circumstances preceding and attending the surrender. Suffice it to say, for the present, that it was accomplished in the most friendly and harmonious manner, although, at one moment, from a misapprehension on both sides, I did not flatter myself with so happy an issue.

Some ordinances for the better government of the town and province, and in fact which are absolutely necessary, have been prepared; copies of these, as well as a report of my whole proceedings as commissioner for receiving possession of Florida, will be forwarded to you as soon as possible, and I am satisfied they will be found strictly within the powers with which I am clothed by the President.

None of the officers appointed by the President for this province have yet joined me; whether any of those appointed for East Florida have arrived, I am not certainly informed.

With great consideration, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, July 18, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you the procès verbal, having retained the duplicate.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

The undersigned, Major General Andrew Jackson, of the State of Tennessee, commissioner of the United States, in pursuance of the full powers received by him from James Monroe, President of the United States of America, of the date of the 10th of March, 1821, and of the forty-fifth [year] of the Independence of the United States of America, attested by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; and Don Jose Callava, commandant of the province of West Florida, and commissioner for the delivery, in the name of His Catholic Majesty, of the country, territory, and dependencies of West Florida, to the commissioner of the United States, in conformity with the powers, commission, and special mandate, received by him from the Captain General of the island of Cuba, of the date of the 5th of May, 1821, imparting to him therein the royal order of the 24th of October, 1820, issued and signed by His Catholic Majesty Ferdinand the Seventh, and attested by the Secretary of State, Don Evaristo Perez de Castro:

Do certify by these presents that, on the seventeenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one of the Christian era, and forty-sixth [year] of the Independence of the United States, having met in the court-room of the Government-house, in the town of Pensacola, accompanied on either part by the chiefs and officers of the Army and Navy, and by a number of the citizens of the respective nations, the said Andrew Jackson, Major General and Commissioner, has delivered to the said colonel commandant, Don Jose Callava, his before-mentioned powers, whereby he recognises him to have received full power and authority to take possession of and to occupy the territories ceded by Spain to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 22d of February, 1819, and for that purpose to repair to said territories, and there to execute and perform all such acts and things touching the premises as may be necessary for fulfilling his appointment conformably to the said treaty and the laws of the United States; with authority, likewise, to appoint any person or persons in his stead to receive possession of any part of the said ceded territories, according to the stipulations of the said treaty. Wherefore, the colonel commandant, Don Jose Callava, immediately declared that, in virtue and in performance of the power, commission, and special mandate, dated at Havana on the 5th of May, 1821, he thenceforth, and from that moment, placed the said commissioner of the United States in possession of the country, territory, and dependencies of West Florida, including the fortress of St. Mark, with the adjacent islands dependent upon said province, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not private property, according to, and in the manner set forth by the inventories and schedules which he has signed and delivered, with the archives and documents directly relating to the property and sovereignty of the said Territory of West Florida, including the fortress of St. Mark, and situated to the east of the Mississippi river; the whole in conformity with the second article of the treaty of cession concluded at Washington, on the 22d of February, 1818, between Spain and the United States, by Don Luis de Onis, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, and John Quincy Adams,

Secretary of State of the United States, both provided with full powers; which treaty has been ratified on the one part by His Catholic Majesty Ferdinand the Seventh, and the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, on the other part; which ratifications have been duly exchanged at Washington the 22d of February, 1821, and the forty-fifth [year] of the Independence of the United States of America, by General Don Dionisio Vives, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, and John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, according to the instrument signed on the same day.

And the present delivery of the country is made in order that, in execution of the said treaty, the sovereignty and the property of that province of West Florida, including the fortress of St. Mark, shall pass to the United States, under the stipulations therein expressed.

And the said Colonel Commandant, Don Jose Callava, has, in consequence, at this present time, made to the Commissioner of the United States, Major General Andrew Jackson, in this public cession, a delivery of the keys of the town of Pensacola, of the archives, documents, and other articles, in the inventories before mentioned; declaring that he releases from their oath of allegiance to Spain the citizens and inhabitants of West Florida, who may choose to remain under the dominion of the United States.

And that this important and solemn act may be in perpetual memory, the within named have signed the same, and have sealed with their respective seals, and caused to be attested by their secretaries of commission, the day and year aforesaid.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By order of the Commissioner on the part of the United States:

R. K. CALL, Sec'y of the Commission.

JOSE CALLAVA.

Por mandato de su Señoría el coronel comisario del Gobierno, de España:

El Secretario de la Comisión, JOSE Y. CRUZAT.

[The following papers, relating to the same subject, were communicated by the messages of the 29th January, 19th April, and 6th May, 1822.]

The Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

Washington, June 13, 1821.

SIR: The hope had been entertained, after the ratification by both parties of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, between the United States and Spain, that all our relations with that country would henceforth have been of the most amicable character, signalized only by the interchange of good offices. It is painful to be obliged, on your return to your station at Madrid, to charge you with representations to be made to the Government of Spain relative to the unwarrantable delays of the Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba in taking the measures incumbent upon him for carrying the treaty into execution.

By the seventh article of the treaty, the Spanish troops were to be withdrawn from the ceded territories, and possession of them was to be given of the places occupied by them within six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible; and the United States were to furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana.

As soon as was practicable after the exchange of the ratifications, arrangements were made on the part of this Government with the view of carrying into effect these stipulations. The royal order from the King of the Spains to the Captain General of the island of Cuba for the delivery of the ceded territories, and of the archives belonging to them, to the Commissioners of the United States authorized to receive them, had been transmitted, with the Spanish ratification of the treaty, to the Minister of Spain residing here, to be delivered by him after the exchange of the ratifications. It was accordingly delivered by him. Colonel James Grant Forbes was appointed by the President to carry it to the Governor of Cuba, and commissioned to receive the orders to the Governors or commanding officers of the places within the territories for their delivery, and also the archives which were to be given up. The United States ship Hornet was despatched to the Havana with Colonel Forbes, who was instructed, on receiving them, to proceed with them forthwith to Pensacola, taking suitable measures for transmitting the order to the Governor of East Florida, at St. Augustine. A letter from the Spanish Minister here to the Governor of Cuba was also furnished to Colonel Forbes, announcing him as the officer authorized to receive the order for delivery and the archives. General Jackson was appointed by the President Governor of East and West Florida, and was instructed to proceed immediately to Montpelier, the post within the United States nearest to Pensacola, there to await the arrival of Colonel Forbes with the necessary orders; upon which the General was directed to receive possession for the United States; and to provide for the transportation of the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana; and by a liberal construction of that article of the treaty, the provisions necessary for the subsistence of these officers and troops on their passage were considered as included within its obligation.

General Jackson reached the post of his destination on the 30th of April. On the 22d of the same month, Colonel Forbes had arrived in the Hornet at Havana; and, had he been despatched without delay, might have arrived at Pensacola in season for the reception of General Jackson, without any unnecessary detention. The letters received at this Department from Colonel Forbes (copies of which are herewith enclosed) exhibit a series of delays on the part of the Governor, for which no adequate reason is assigned, but which have already produced great public inconvenience to the United States, and which, if longer continued, will give them the most serious grounds of complaint. The last letter received from Colonel Forbes bears date the 23d of May, when his detention had already been protracted more than a month; in the interval of which, the reappearance of the disease incidental to the climate excited strong apprehensions for the health of the captain and crew of the Hornet, as well as of Colonel Forbes himself. There is too much reason for the alarm with regard to Captain Read, who is stated, by accounts of dates more recent than those officially received, to have been on the 28th of May still at the Havana, and very dangerously ill.

General Jackson, desirous of ascertaining the number of men for whom it would be necessary to procure transports and provisions, as well as to make arrangements for the supplies necessary to the troops of the United States who were to take their place, sent, on the first of May, Dr. Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to Pensacola, with a communication to Don Jose Callava, Governor of West Florida, to communicate to him the commission and authority with which he was clothed, and to ask of him such information as would be necessary for the arrangements adapted to the evacuation of the territory by the troops of Spain; and to the taking of possession on the part of the United States. Governor Callava declined making any such communication, declaring himself subordinate altogether to the Governor General of Cuba; and that he did not feel authorized to act at all in regard to the execution of the treaty, until duly instructed to that effect by his superior officer. The letters (copies of all which are enclosed) contain intimations from various sources that all these dilatory proceedings have too much connexion with private purposes and dishonorable pecuniary speculations. It is yet wished that this awkward and unpleasant state of things may before this have terminated; but the unreasonable delays of the Governor General of Cuba, inconsistent no less with good faith than with the good harmony which we are so desirous of cultivating with Spain, cannot be suffered to pass without animadversion. You will take the earliest opportunity after your arrival at Madrid to make suitable representations on this subject to the Spanish Government, and to state that whatever unpleasant or injurious consequences may result from this unwarrantable conduct of the Governor of Cuba might be attributed altogether to him.

By the fourth article of the treaty, each of the contracting parties engaged to appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, to meet before the termination of one year from the ratification of the treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, to run and mark the boundary line. Colonel McRea has been appointed the commissioner on the part of the United States, and will be ready to proceed on the important duties of the commission as soon as the appointment of the Spanish commissioner and surveyor shall be notified to us. It is further stipulated that the two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and to their escorts, if necessary. At the time of the exchange of rati-fications, General Vives, at my request, promised to remind his Government of the necessity of an immediate appointment of the commissioner and surveyor on their part. It is presumed this will have been done before you reach Madrid. Your attention to the subject is nevertheless requested, in case any thing should yet remain to be done to put in train the execution of this article. As the necessary supplies for the commissioners will be naturally best known on the scene of their operations, it is presumed the Spanish Government will authorize its Minister here to agree for them to such arrangements in this particular as may be found necessary.

I am, with much respect, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

Washington, June 16, 1821.

SIR: Since my letter of the 13th instant, a letter of the 28th ultimo, with enclosures, has been received by Colonel James G. Forbes, copies of which will be forwarded to you next week. By a letter of the 5th instant from Mr. Warner, our commercial agent at the Havana, we are informed that Colonel Forbes, in the Hornet, sailed for Pensacola on the 30th ultimo, and the Nonsuch for St. Augustine on the 1st instant.

It is hoped that on the arrival of these vessels at the places of their destination no further vexatious and unwarrantable delays will occur in the execution of the seventh article of the treaty. But Colonel Forbes has been obliged to depart without the archives and public documents which were stipulated by the treaty, and directed by the royal order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba to be delivered over to us.

As Colonel Forbes thus appears to have been at last despatched, the uncertainty as to the extent of time during which this measure might be protracted has ceased; and the representation which, by my letter of the 13th instant, you were requested to make to the Spanish Government, will properly be accommodated to the circumstances as now known to us. With the complaint of delays, without assignment of any reasonable cause, which it will yet be proper that you should prefer, a firmer confidence in the expectation that no further unnecessary postponements will occur may be expressed; but our disappointment at the detention of the archives will also require to be more explicitly signified; and it will be very desirable that you should obtain a new and peremptory order to the Governor and Captain General for the delivery of all the archives and documents to which we are entitled by the treaty, which will leave him no apology or pretence for either denial or procrastination.

I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

MADRID, September, 1821.

As soon as the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, was ratified by the Government of my country, the necessary steps were immediately taken on its part for carrying it into execution. By the 7th article of the treaty, the Spanish troops were to be withdrawn from the ceded territories, and possession was to be given of the places occupied by them within six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible; and the United States were to furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and soldiers to the Havana. The royal order from His Catholic Majesty to the Captain General of Cuba for the delivery of the ceded territories, and of the archives belonging to them, to the commissioner of the United States authorized to receive them, was delivered by His Majesty's Minister to the American Government with the ratified treaty. Colonel J. G. Forbes was appointed by the President to convey this order to the Governor of Cuba, and commissioned to receive the orders of the Governors or commanding officers of the places within the territories for their delivery, and also the archives that were to be given up. The ship of war Hornet was sent to the Havana with Col. Forbes, who was directed, on receiving them, to proceed forthwith to Pensacola, taking suitable measures for transmitting the order to the Government of East Florida at St. Augustine. A letter from the Spanish Minister near the United States to the Governor of Cuba was also furnished, announcing Colonel Forbes as the officer appointed to receive the order for delivery and the archives.

General Jackson was appointed Governor of East and West Florida by the President, and was instructed to proceed to Montpelier, the post within the United States nearest to Pensacola, there to await the arrival of Colonel Forbes with the necessary orders; upon which the General was directed to receive possession for the United States, and provide for the transportation of the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana; and, by a liberal construction, the provisions for the subsistence of the officers and troops were considered as included within the obligation of the seventh article of the treaty.

General Jackson reached the post of Montpelier on the 30th of April. On the 22d of the same month, the Hornet arrived at Havana with Colonel Forbes; and, had he been despatched without delay, might have arrived at Pensacola in season for the reception of General Jackson, without unnecessary detention. It is with regret that I have to state that, so far from immediately despatching Colonel Forbes, by issuing the necessary orders, and delivering the archives, there was, on the part of the Governor General of Cuba, a series of delays, for which no adequate reason has been assigned, until the end of the month of May, and then Colonel Forbes was under the necessity of departing without having received the archives. Great public inconvenience has been, and will be, sustained by this conduct of the Captain General, not less inconsistent with the obligations of the treaty, than, as the United States believe, with the orders of his own Government. The health of the commissioner and of the officers and the crew of the Hornet was endangered by a continuance, at an unhealthy season, in the port of Havana; in fact, her commander, Captain Read, a gallant and meritorious officer, was nearly lost to his country by the ravages of the prevalent disease of the West Indies. General Jackson, desirous of ascertaining the number of men for whom it would be necessary to procure transports and provisions, as well as to make arrangements for the supplies necessary to the troops of the United States who were to take their place, sent, on the 1st of May, a communication to the Governor of West Florida of the commission and authority vested in him by the President, and to ask such information as was necessary to provide for the evacuation of the territory by the Spanish troops, and the occupation of it by those of the United States. This information was not furnished; Colonel Callava replying that he could not act until duly authorized by his superior officer.

In the mean time, intimations were received by the American Government, from various sources, that these delays had too much connexion with private purposes and dishonorable pecuniary speculations. Without giving credit to these intimations, the Government of my country is nevertheless under the necessity of stating that all the injury which has been sustained, and may arise, from the delay to deliver the ceded territory, is to be imputable to the Governor of Cuba; and while the proper confidence is entertained that no further unnecessary postponements will occur in the evacuation of the territory, the failure to deliver the archives is a subject of surprise and disappointment. Although, by the royal order, the delivery of the archives is expressly directed, I would submit to your Excellency the propriety of furnishing me with a new and peremptory order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba for the delivery of all the archives and documents to which we are entitled by treaty, that will leave him neither apology nor pretence for denial or procrastination.

Mr. Salmon to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 6, 1821.

SIR: It falls to my lot, and to me it is very grievous, to see myself under the necessity of commencing my functions as Chargé d'Affaires of His Catholic Majesty with complaints. This is the more sensibly felt by me, inasmuch as I have to direct them against an officer of the United States, a conspicuous citizen of the Union, and a highly distinguished General—the hero of New Orleans.

Colonel Don Joseph Callava, as commissary on the part of Spain, confirmed the delivery of West Florida to General Andrew Jackson, who was authorized to receive it, on the 17th of July last; and he could not leave the province on the same day, because it was impossible for him to have concluded the press of business which the delivery produced; and, also, because he was sick; and, lastly, because he had, with the same General, to await the decision of their respective Governments whether the artillery should be included in the treaty or removed, (which was kept in the mean time under his care.) Upon this decision, principally, his remaining in Florida depended, in order to consummate the delivery. Colonel Callava, therefore, remained there, not as an individual, for his pleasure and personal purposes, but for fulfilling his duty as a commissary, charged to give a due effect to the treaty of 22d February. As a commissary, he acted with Governor Jackson many days after the delivery of the province, (on the 3d of August;) and, as a commissary, he was in the territory of a friendly nation, under the protection of the most sacred law of nations. But all laws, divine and human, were, in the present case, trampled under foot by General Jackson.

By the accompanying copy of protest, you will be informed, sir, minutely, of the transactions at Pensacola on the 22d of August last. A copy of other faithful documents likewise accompanies this, which prove the truth and correctness of the whole, as far as the commissary, Don Joseph Callava, has explained; and I am also ready to show you the originals whenever you may demand them.

The treaty of the 22d February speaks of certain documents and papers which the Spanish commissaries were to deliver to those of the United States along with the Floridas, being allowed to carry away others only. The classification of the whole being made, Colonel Callava made the delivery in due form of the former, and then of the second to the Secretary of War and Finance, the officer Don Domingo Sousa; leaving the official correspondence of the Government in the charge of the secretary. The whole were ordered to be put in boxes, in order that, as soon as the commission should be concluded, they might be removed from the province; and Sousa was executing the orders of the commissary, Callava, when three men (to him unknown) presented themselves to him, and, saying that they were commissioned by Governor Jackson, demanded of him those papers. Sousa replied that they were not his, and consequently that he could not give them; but if there were any which they wanted, they could have recourse to his principal, the commissary; but the sight and examination of them were not refused. The same men afterwards returned, repeating that they came for the said papers, and they gave him a note of those which they demanded. Sousa replied as before; but, alarmed at the second visit, and fearing lest they should be taken away, he carried them (now in boxes) to the house of the commissary; but, finding him absent, he gave them to his steward. Such is the origin, without disguise, of the atrocious injustice which was afterwards committed upon the Spanish commissary, Callava.

Although his subjoined document shows that none of the papers were of the class of those which ought to have been delivered, since they had no direct relation to the sovereignty and public property of the province, (as the whole belonged to the military, financial, admiralty, or Government archives,) yet there is no opportunity, at present, for discussion on this point. Wherefore, he wishes it to be well understood that General Jackson did not demand them officially of him, Callava; and that a question of that sort ought not to be decided, in the first instance, by the bayonet. Notwithstanding this, the aforesaid General acted in the manner which you will see explained.

Only upon slight suspicions that the Spanish commissary unduly retained some documents, and without their having been demanded in the regular and accustomed way, was his house assaulted and entered by force, in the silence of the night, by a company of soldiers. The servants and friends who were with him were driven from it, and he, being alone, sick, and almost confined to bed, was torn from it with sad array, and conducted, like the most abandoned criminal, about the middle of the night, before Governor Jackson. In vain did he represent the privilege of his character. In vain did he protest against a conduct so atrocious. In vain did he beg to be kept in arrest at his own house, or at least that time should be given him to recover a little from the illness under which he labored. All was in vain. In so abandoned a situation, even there, also, he underwent a species of trial which he could not understand, from his ignorance of the language. A person acted as interpreter, who did not choose to interpret all that he said. A person who acted as interpreter and secretary at the same time, gave as such testimony what that very person had said, and not what the Spanish commissary had wished he should say. From thence they carried him to the prison and he was set at liberty the day following; but his house, in the mean time, his property, and the papers of his Government, remained at the mercy of the soldiery. He found the seals of his Government broken, and some papers thrown about, and of that he took testimony. This is, in a few words, the history of the noisy occurrence of the 22d August, in Pensacola.

Colonel Callava, considered as a private individual, was in Florida under the protection of the civil laws which secure property and persons. As the Federal Constitution, so also, the present Spanish constitution guaranties these laws of protection. Both constitutions separate the judicial power from the executive, which the Governor or Captain General of a province exercises, (without which the power would not be independent.) Both constitutions, then, condemn the acts of the General. Arbitrariness in the decrees, informality in the process, inhumanity in the execution of the decrees, are here the characteristics of his procedure with Callava. General Jackson, as Commissary, as Governor, and even, if you please, as Supreme Judge, trod all the laws under foot.

If Callava be considered, as in fact he was, as Commissary of His Catholic Majesty for bringing to a due conclusion the treaty of the 22d of February, he remained in Florida under the privilege and protection which the laws of the countries (the most sacred) and the law of nations grant. In every way the procedure of General Jackson is irregular, illegal, unconstitutional, and violent. If the security of his person be not guarantied to the commissary, if impediments are put in the way of the exercise of his duty, how can he execute the charge with which the King has intrusted him according to the last treaty of the 22d of February?

The scandalous proceeding of General Jackson against the Spanish commissary is wholly without example, and my Government cannot but view it as a grievous offence committed against Spain. It will be viewed, even by the sensible citizens of this Union, whose sentiments on the point of honor and philanthropy are well known to the whole world, as an insult offered to their country, and to the free constitution which governs it. All nations who esteem themselves civilized and Christian will look upon it as an outrage upon humanity itself.

Wherefore, I believe it my duty to protest, and I do protest, in the name of His Catholic Majesty, before the Government of the United States, against the injustice which General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, has committed upon the Spanish commissary, Colonel Don Jose Callava. And I doubt not but that the Federal Government, upon a view of the authentic facts which I have related, will highly disapprove of the irregular and precipitate conduct of the above-mentioned General, and thus give to Spain a proof of friendship which will redound to the honor of both nations; and I expect this with the more confidence, since His Catholic Majesty has recently determined to give a new evidence, among many others, of his particular esteem and regard for the interests of the United States in the permission which he has granted them of keeping in Mahon a deposite of provisions and naval stores, which they may introduce free of duties.

I embrace this occasion of doing myself the honor to present to you, sir, a testimony of my particular respect and distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

Protest of Colonel Callava.

PHILADELPHIA, October 3, 1821.

I, Don Jose Callava, Colonel of the Spanish armies, late Governor of West Florida, and at present commissary, representing my Government, in order to carry into complete effect the stipulations between His Catholic Majesty and the President of the United States of America in relation to said Florida, in the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits which they made and ratified on the twenty-second of February of the present year, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, do make oath, as far as the law requires, upon my honor, as to the truth of what was committed against my privilege, person, house, and papers, on the evening and night of the twenty-second day of August of the said present year, by Don Andrew Jackson, commissary in said Florida, representing the United States under the same treaty.

On the 17th day of July last, at ten o'clock in the morning, I delivered West Florida, which was that day under my charge as Governor, in which character he met me, to the commissary, Don Andrew Jackson, in a public act held in the Government house. There he received from me all the archives and documents registered, and directly relative to the property and sovereignty of that province of Florida; and he received them by faithful and exact inventories, which had been compared with the documents by four persons, and had been certified to be correct. From the constitutional Spanish alcalde, and by my order, an alcalde named by Don Andrew Jackson received, by like inventories, all the criminal and civil causes of the suits of the neighborhood which are pending before the tribunal of the first instance, over which he presided, and also the notices and papers of its archives.

The papers of the official correspondence belonging to the secretary's office remained in the charge of the secretary of my Government; and the military papers, judicial proceedings of the national finance, and arrivals, (arribadas fincidas), belonging to their respective branches at the Havana, to which they have been restored by the evacuation, remained with the Secretary of War and Finance, which office Don Domingo Sousa had exercised for the space of fifteen or twenty years. There also remained the smaller vessels, their crews, carpenters, and blacksmiths of the garrison, the effects of the magazines, which were to be withdrawn; the commander of artillery, with the accounting officer of that department, some sick troops, and myself with the aforesaid; and the effects, and all that remained under my authority and prerogative, during the execution of what was intrusted to me, and ordered to be completely fulfilled; and the artillery, with what belonged to that department, kept under my protection during the delivery or removing of it, (which in either case had to be executed by me,) according to the determination which might be made by the President of the United States and the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near that Government, according to an agreement entered into by us, the commissaries, (as the official correspondence between us shows,) and to which I have given performance; and in this state, and as far as I have related, I have waited for that resolution, (which is yet pending;) and the commissary, Don Andrew Jackson, so understood me,

(for my Government has substituted no other person in my place;) and I also was recovering from an acute disease, which had at that time brought me to the gates of death.

The day previous to these transactions, (the 21st of August,) three persons, dependants of Don Andrew Jackson, came to the house of the secretary, (Sousa,) to be informed if he had in his possession some military testamentary dispositions, which they mentioned to him. Sousa told them yes, and without reserve they were shown to them; and he informed them that if they wished for any thing, they should ask me. All the papers which he had in his charge were closely examined: they declared they would carry off those which they had pointed out to him, because they could not be in his possession as a private individual. Sousa told them that he was not a private individual; that he was an officer depending on my commission and authority; and that he could not give them without my order. And finally they went away, leaving the papers. They demanded of him an answer in writing, which they obtained from Sousa, on a second visit.

The following day, (the 22d,) in the morning, this officer met me in the street. He informed me of the occurrence, and also told me that he had resolved to carry the boxes to my house, with all the papers which he had in his possession, and had delivered them to my steward, not having found me within; because he was afraid, from what he had observed in those people, that they might take them away from his house, and he wished to save himself from the responsibility. And I answered that it was well.

At four in the afternoon of the same day, and not much before, I was dining at the table of Colonel George M. Brooke, of the fourth regiment of the United States line, and of the garrison at Pensacola, by whom I had been invited, with all the Spanish officers residing there. The company consisted of Brooke, his wife, Judge Fromentin, the commander of the United States vessel of war Enterprise, Mr. Michael Kearney, the citizens Vicar Don James Coleman, Don John Innerarity, Don Juan de la Rua, Don Pedro de Alba, and Don Jose Noriega; and the officers Lieutenant Colonels Don Marcos de Villiers and Don Francisco Palmos; Captains Don Luis Guayare and Don Bernardo Prieto; Lieutenants Don Arnaldo Guillemard and Don Carlos de Villiers; and Sub-lieutenants Don Mariano Latady, and Don Jose Ignacio Cruzat, secretary of my Government.

Don Domingo Sousa presented himself to me there, with an officer of the United States, telling me that he was a prisoner; and that the reason was, that the three persons of the former day had returned to his house the day before, telling him that they came with orders from Governor Andrew Jackson to seize the papers; that, having informed them that he had that morning sent them to my house, they searched his house, and at last carried him to prison. And he related before the company what had occurred about the papers with the same persons the preceding day.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

I immediately ordered my aid-de-camp, Don Bernardo Prieto, accompanied by Alba, who was the public interpreter, to present my compliments to Don Andrew Jackson, and to inform him that Sousa was in fact, as he had intimated, an individual of my commission, and was under my power and authority; and that he could not deliver the papers in question of himself; that he would have the goodness to ask me in writing for such as he might find it proper to claim; and if they were to be given by the regulation of the treaty, or other particular circumstances, I would deliver them to him by the same procedure which indispensable regularity dictated, as had been done with the other papers; or that he should have, in the same way, a distinct explanation of the reasons which prevented their delivery; and that every direct mode of conciliation should be sought, if there was any thing that could be of use to him in any way.

The aid-de-camp and interpreter brought back for answer that Sousa should go to prison, and that they should tell me that I should be put into another dungeon with him.

It appearing to me that Don Andrew Jackson had not been well informed of my message by the interpretation, (although the incident offended me and surprised those at table,) I made the same persons return and inform him a second time; and that gentleman repeated to them in a loud voice, in the presence of several persons, and upon the street balcony, the same thing, saying, Colonel Callava to the dungeon!

An occurrence so strange and abusive in the presence of those who surrounded me at table, a great part of whom were there as a greater compliment to me, and others my subordinates, could not but raise a blush in my face, and disorder my stomach in the very act of eating, and in the convalescent state in which I was; and I felt myself attacked by a deadly pain, (which I almost habitually suffered, and which had frequently attacked me on the preceding days;) notwithstanding, I concealed the circumstance so as to render it impossible to be discovered, that, upon quitting the table, I might go and reflect, for it was not known upon what such answers or occurrences rested.

We all left the table. Brooke's lady was very much grieved, and I was going to the street, when three persons presented themselves to me in Brooke's house, telling me, from Don Andrew Jackson, that they came for the papers which Sousa had carried to my house, or to carry me with them to Jackson's house; because the Governor, with his authority, could not respect me in any other light than as a private individual.

Astonished to find myself involved in such events, with expressive actions I entreated them to do me the honor of returning to the commissary Governor with my compliments, asking him how he could forget that I was the Spanish commissary who had delivered to him that province, and whom he had found as Governor in it, and who at the same time had not been removed by his Government, nor concluded the delivery, nor withdrawn the artillery, (the destination of which was expected,) nor of other things under my power? That I was surprised at what passed between us; that he would have the goodness to reflect that every paper in my possession on that day belonged to the Government which I had exercised in that province, was sacred under my authority and character, by the privilege of the law of nations, which has always been mutually observed and respected among nations, as to those individuals of either to whom the execution of treaties has been intrusted, or other commissioners, and it is a thing unknown that any authority has forcibly violated a trust so sacred, without cause or reason; that whatever paper he might wish to ask, he might demand of me in writing; that, on that very day, I had offered him this, if it was to be given, or the reasons for its not being my duty, or not being in my power to give them; that this was the only mode agreeable to the exact usual procedure in the important charge with which we were intrusted, in the political subject between nations, in the performance of which he could not, by his authority, call my proceedings in question, nor constrain them by judicial force as Governor, by which the security of the papers in my possession could be violated, or any other thing directly depending not on my person, but on my official situation; that I should preserve, as to myself and to my nation, the peace and harmony in which I found our countries, and that I have preserved it with the utmost care as to the Commissary, and as to the Governor, as far as I have been concerned with him, and also preserved it indiscriminately to all the citizens of the United States who had remained permanently in Florida, or who had passed through during my government.

The officers went away to carry this answer, which was given them in the presence of all at Brooke's house; and I, feeling now a recurrence of my pain, requested them to permit me to go home, whither several of those persons accompanied me. As soon as I arrived, I caused my secretary to extend in my office all that I had said to the persons sent, and with him I sent Lieutenant Colonel De Villiers, accompanied by another officer, to the Governor, thinking that thus my answer might be more correctly understood by him; but, when it was presented he would not receive it, and they brought it back to me unopen.

After these officers returned to me, now at my own house, the same three persons came with a determined and brief message that I must not make any pretensions to official situation or other considerations—"the papers, or go with them." I was surrounded by my officers, and other persons of character, whose countenances I saw filled with pain and surprise to see me in the sad state of suffering, and unable to remain tranquil. Till then I knew not of what papers they spoke, as I had not entered upon an inquiry, nor had they given me an opportunity of doing so; and I answered them that I was unable to go out of my house. I entreated that they would, at least, give me an abstract of what papers and of what class those were which they demanded, and I would inform Don Andrew Jackson that I was sick.

Without giving me any answer, they went away, and I laid myself on the bed. An hour afterwards, one of the three presented himself in my house, and gave me an abstract, written on a half sheet of paper, in the English language, and signed "Alcalde Brackenridge." I took it; I told him that I should have it translated, and should reply to it. He went away. I gave it to the interpreter at that hour, which was nine at night, and sought repose on the bed; but, a while after, and without further preliminaries, a party of troops, with the commissioners, assaulted the house, breaking the fence, notwithstanding the door was open; and the commissioners entered my apartment; they surrounded my bed with soldiers with drawn bayonets in their hands; they removed the mosquito net; they made me sit up; and demanded "the papers, or they would use the arms against my person."

It ought to be remarked, that, of the three, only one spoke and understood a little of the Spanish language. He was the only interpreter; and I neither spoke nor understood one word of English, and thus I neither knew what he said to his companions respecting what I answered, nor did they know what was asked me. I had to do with him alone, and he was one who had gone and returned with them in all their visits. Some officers and other persons who had accompanied me from the house of Brooke, and who had not yet retired, and were seated in the gallery of the house, leaving me to repose, entered the room; and I answered in their presence that the note had not yet been returned translated, but that this was of no consequence; that there were all the boxes containing papers, my trunks, and all my house; that, since force had once been openly used in their command, they there had every thing at their disposal, without any resistance on my part; but that, before they should proceed to take what they thought fit, I represented to them that now, since my person was not secure as a free man, and in a free country, in the asylum of my house, and in the dead of the night, and that what ought to be preserved to my nation was not respected in my official situation and character, I laid these things before the Government of the United States, and took refuge under their laws, and hoped that they would respect both.

They did not proceed to search for papers, nor did they move any further question about them, when they now saw them at their disposal; but they ordered the troops to carry arms, leave me alone, and send from my house those who assisted and accompanied me. This they did; and to one who appeared desirous to interpret in English what I had said for their better understanding, they intimated, with threats, that he should be silent as soon as he had begun; and I continued alone sitting on the bed, and they in the apartment, looking at each other.

In fine, in a short while after, one of the three went out, and returned accompanied with an officer, who, placing himself before me, told me I was a prisoner, and ordered me to dress myself. I answered that I was so, but that he would have the goodness to observe that I was so sick as that

I ought not to be taken out of my house at that hour. He made no answer to the interpreter, and remained silent; but one of the three deliberately ordered me to dress. I dressed in my uniform, was going to put on my sword, but, upon reflection, thought it better to deliver it to the officer. I did so, and one of the three took it from his hand and threw it upon the chimney, and in this manner I was conducted through the streets among the troops.

They took me to a private house, in which they presented me to Don Andrew Jackson, who, with two other persons, was seated near a table; the house was filled with people of all ages and classes, and there he made me a sign to sit down, which I did. By the only interpreter who had hitherto delivered and carried back the verbal messages I have already mentioned, he put one question to me, according to my recollection, confined solely to whether certain papers had been carried to my house by Don Domingo Sousa, and delivered to my steward.

I requested him to permit me to answer in writing, and to do so with my own hand. He granted it readily. I set myself to write a regular protest, that I might go on to answer afterwards; but I had hardly begun when Don Andrew Jackson took the paper from before me, and, with much violence and furious gestures, spoke for some time, looking at the by-standers; and when he had concluded the interpreter told me that he had ordered me to give no other answer to all that he had asked me but yes or no. I replied that I offered to be very brief, but that he should question me by writing the question, and permitting me to write the answer with my own hand, and give in my turn the most precise reason for it. He absolutely refused me, and the interpreter wrote upon that same paper which had been snatched from me I know not what.

Don Andrew Jackson proceeded to speak for a considerable time, looking at the people, but speaking furiously; and in the countenances of the by-standers I perceived fear or surprise, caused by what he said. He concluded, and the interpreter told me that the Governor would not treat with me in any other way than as a private individual; this idea (which I knew not how to account for) made me catch at the word, and demand some explanations. Don Andrew Jackson did not permit me to speak. I insisted that the interpreter should translate what I said; he was sometimes about to do this, and he interrupted him at the very beginning; so that of all that he said in two hours, (and Don Andrew Jackson directed himself to me,) only the aforesaid intimation was translated to me, that I had not a word to answer but yes or no to what I should be asked, and that the Governor would not treat me in any other way than as a private individual. Nothing was read to me, nor was I informed of any thing which the interpreter wrote in that act, nor was any signature required of me; and seeing myself in such circumstances I put a question, by my secretary, to that of the Government of Don Andrew Jackson, if he could furnish me with an authentic copy of all that had been written in the execution of these transactions, and he answered him in the affirmative.

I remained silent; they called my steward; they asked him if certain papers had been delivered to him by Sousa at my house? He answered, yes.

Don Andrew Jackson drew from among other papers one which was already written; he read it to me, and it contained the order for committing me and my steward to prison.

I got upon my feet; I begged the interpreter to ask him if he did not shudder, and was not struck with horror at insulting me; and I pronounced a solemn protest against his proceedings. The interpreter informed him, and he replied, that for what he had done he had no account to give but to his Government, and he told me that I might protest before God himself.

I was carried off to prison at twelve at night, and my steward also. I left my house open, with three or four soldiers of the United States troops in it. I left all my private papers, all the official correspondence of my Government, and what was under my charge officially, without any account, at the discretion of Don Andrew Jackson. The keys of my trunks and money chests were not removed. I left in my house no person to represent me, and who was in my confidence; and, lastly, by a respectable citizen of the United States, and my officers, at two in the morning, a couch was spread for me and my other assistants to throw ourselves down upon; (for, by Don Andrew Jackson, I was permitted to throw myself, sick as I was, upon the bricks of the prison;) when, afterwards, I was informed by various persons who understood the Spanish and English languages, that the matters above related, which had been conceived against me, and were not translated by the interpreter, consisted in having endeavored to persuade the people that the papers were taken from the office of the alcalde, and that I was an accomplice in that criminal action.

At eleven in the morning of the following day, the 23d,) Judge Eligius Fromentin issued a writ of habeas corpus for the release of my person; and Don Andrew Jackson answered that it was not proper to carry it into execution; but, on the same day, at one in the afternoon, he gave order that an officer should inform me that I was released from prison, and might be accompanied by him to my house to examine if the boxes were sealed.

I replied to the person who communicated this to me that I could not enter it unless accompanied by a judge, who might be present, and certify to the situation in which all things in it were found, since I had been dragged from it, leaving every thing to their discretion.

The officer accompanied me into the presence of Judge Fromentin, whom we found sick. I related to him what had happened, and entreated him to afford the protection of the law to my prerogative, person, and house. He informed me that he could not assist me, because his situation rendered it impossible; but he would cause witnesses to accompany me, who should make the examination, and sign it.

I went thither with the officer and many other persons: it was found open, with three or four soldiers within; the papers of official correspondence scattered upon the table, and the covers open; one box, which was left shut, and sealed with the seal of my Government, had been burst open, the seals broken, and again shut, with different seals; and nothing was found wrong in the contents of the money chest. I had not time to examine the papers, nor could I do it, because I was too much indisposed.

On the 26th day of the same month, about half past three in the afternoon, the secretary of the Government of Don Andrew Jackson delivered to mine the testimony which I had asked on the night of the 22d; and early in the morning of the following day, (the 27th,) sick as I was, I set out with my secretary for Washington, to give an account to the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near the Government of the United States, leaving without my power and authority in Pensacola what was under my charge belonging to the nation of which I am a dependant, because in me all confidence and every law of nations had been violated by the authority now existing there.

To this faithful narrative, to which I have sworn upon my honor, I add separately, in order to avoid confusion, notes and observations which express and produce the necessary proofs for this condensation.

1st. That the papers in question were most legally and regularly given to the care of Don Domingo Sousa, into his possession, and under my power and authority.

2dly. That they never were abstracted, fraudulently or otherwise, from the archives of the alcaldes.

3dly. That he did not think of concealing them.

4thly. That it was impossible to conceal them, and,

5thly. The nullity and bad aspect of the judicial proceedings against me, against my subaltern, and against my steward, by Don Andrew Jackson, on the day of those events and actions which I have related; and I have produced the proofs of them, as well by authentic as by original documents, all which might be considered as an integral part of this relation, to which I have sworn. And, therefore.

Seeing that Don Andrew Jackson, at present Governor of West Florida, has violated, in that territory, under his authority, the immunity and confidence with which I held in it my situation of commissary for Spain, carrying into effect, under that treaty, what was stipulated by her and the United States in a solemn treaty: that he has also violated the pale of my charge, by breaking open and plundering their sanctuary, at his own discretion alone; by insulting my person in the most illegal manner, and by deeply wounding my character and honor, with the supposition, before the public, of events which I leave to their merits, (amertadas;) and by obliging me by all this to leave Spain without a representative in said Florida, to the dereliction of its interests: I solemnly protest against the aforesaid Don Andrew Jackson, as the actor in the before-mentioned deeds, before the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near the Government of the United States of America.

APPENDIX TO COL. CALLAVA'S PROTEST.

Statement of the papers comprehended in the notice of the 22d August, sent to the Spanish commissary, Don Jose Callava, by a person who signed himself H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde.

1. The papers relative to the testamentary disposition of Jose Maria Vidal.
2. The proceedings in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville.
3. The proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.
4. The documents in the case of Pedro Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca.

Observations and elucidations which show the merit importance, and circumstances of these papers.

THOSE OF VIDAL.

Vidal died auditor of war, in Pensacola, in eighteen hundred and six; he left four daughters, whom he had by a mulatto woman, who were informed by the authorities of those times of the sale of some part of their property at Baton Rouge, and, of course, their right to it, and Vidal's property in it ceased, because its having passed to another possessor appears evident from all the antecedent decrees in the register and notarial offices, where the property was then sold, and may afterwards be sold, passing from one to another.

What may depend upon that testamentary disposition has nothing to do with Florida, and belongs entirely to some creditors whom Vidal left residing in the Spanish territories; therefore, those papers belong to the captainship general, with its auditory of war, because, by the evacuation of Florida, it has resumed the authority and tribunal of the Spanish Government of Pensacola. I repeat, it has no existence at this day in Florida: the right of presenting their actions in their proper and natural tribunals cannot be taken from creditors who are Spaniards and reside in the territories of Spain; but, nevertheless, it is also observed (in order to convince that not one person was injured by it in West Florida, in any point of view) that, after the evacuation of the province, the quadroon Merced, daughter of Vidal, requested the Spanish commissary to deliver to her this testamentary disposition, in order that she might show it to lawyers of the United States, that they might inform her if she could obtain any thing from it; and the Spanish commissary ordered the clerk, Don Domingo Sousa, to give it to her, and he told the quadroon, if she wished to procure an authentic copy, to remain in Pensacola, or in her own power, that she might extract it in her own house, and avoid the expenses of the clerk, and that what might be extracted might be immediately compared, and he would legalize the whole, gratis. The quadroon received these papers, and had them on the day when they were demanded in the manner expressed in the proceedings, and she may have them still, since they have neither been procured or demanded to be returned: all which will be hereafter verified.

THOSE OF CARLOS DE VILLE.

Carlos de Ville was a lieutenant colonel of the regiment of Louisiana, stationed in the garrison of Pensacola, and died in eighteen hundred and twenty, (in the time of my Government.) About six months before his death, more or less, he sold a house, the only property he had in Florida, and, after his death, all that he left came, in the end, (vino en remmen.) to consist of some pay which was due for his service by the National Treasury. He named as his executor an officer of his own regiment, who went in one of the transports to join it in Havana, on the day of the evacuation of Florida, carrying with him the papers of the testamentary disposition to obtain from the Treasury what was due to the deceased De Ville: he also left some children, whom he had by a mulatto woman, as his sole heirs, but neither their mother nor they are in Florida, or have a residence in it.

Four or six months after the death of De Ville, a difference arose between a Spanish agent, named Don Eugene Sierra, against the testamentary execution about the right of property of a small part of the enclosure of the house which he had sold. Sierra had no means of justifying his claim; I decreed that he should present the proof of property in the time prescribed by law, and that, in the mean time, the executor should not dispose of the property according to the provisions of the testamentary disposition; and thus this difference was suspended, waiting for the time. The property is in possession of the executor at the Havana; thither Sierra is destined, as well as the other agents who have been removed from Florida: the purchaser has quiet and peaceable possession of what he purchased by public and registered deed in the archive delivered, so that, if Sierra has a right, the recovery is certain, and in the place where he can do it; therefore, the demand of these papers is yet more unnecessary, if possible, than that of the others, and their trifling importance has been seen.

THE CASE OF PEDRO GUILKES AND TOMAS VILLASECA.

They have had a dispute for about fifteen years in the court of the Treasury, (tribunal de Hacienda.) concerning the right of property of a piece of ground; the proceedings proved that it was in neither, and the Treasury sold it for two or three hundred dollars, and in those times employed it in building three small wooden bridges over some rivulets, for the more convenient passage of the people. The purchaser justified the property in Florida by a deed, or document, which the Treasury granted him. Villaseca and Guilkes could not be permitted to plead to a thing which had been finished fifteen years by authority of an affair judged of, nor can it enter into the imagination that it can interest them, nor that they have pretended such a thing, as, in fact, it is not evident that they have made any such request; it is only to be attributed to this: that, on the day when Sousa showed all the papers to those three persons, they, from their animosity, and without entering into an investigation of the precedents, became judges, parties, and attorneys, without knowing what they asked. The proceedings of the Treasury in recoveries, and which produce its entries, are those which produce due steadiness in account and reckoning.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

The importance, merit, and circumstance of the papers have been deduced. The case of Manuel Bonfay, which was mentioned in the abstract of Brackenridge, does not take place, because it is comprehended in that of Sierra and De Ville; Bonfay being the person who represents the purchaser of the house: which is another convincing circumstance that the same Brackenridge did not understand what he asked for.

Observations and precedents, which form proofs that the papers in question were, with the greatest legitimacy and in the care of Don Domingo Sousa, and under my power and authority.

That they never were fraudulently or otherwise taken by him from the archives of the alcaldes.

That he thought as little of concealing them, and that the concealment of them was next to impossible.

And lastly, reflections in regard to the interest to which the actions of Don Andrew Jackson against the Spanish commissary could contribute.

OBSERVATION 1.

The Governor of Pensacola, with a lawyer of the title of auditor, exercised all the authority of West Florida in the courts known in Spain, previous to the constitution, except the ecclesiastic, and constituted there the tribunal of the first instance, in which Don Domingo Sousa had acted for fifteen or twenty years as secretary, with an assistant; and under his care, and in his office, were all the causes and documents of the office, because there never had been in Pensacola a person under the title of Secretary.

OBSERVATION 2.

In the middle of the year 1820, the constitution was established in Pensacola, and by it the political and military governors were deprived of the jurisdiction which they exercised by the ordinary ancient custom. The nomination of a constitutional alcalde took place, into whose power that court came, (he was Don Jose Noriega,) and to Sousa all the causes and papers relative to the sentence which this alcalde passed came by inventories now existing. It does not appear in those inventories that the papers mentioned in the notice of Brackenridge had been passed to him, which had not taken place, for the reasons which will be mentioned in the following observation.

OBSERVATION 3.

The military court was left by the constitution in the same state as formerly, and by that the Governor, with his auditor, exercised in it the same jurisdiction as before. The causes of finance, also, were of the same resort, as well as those of the arribadas; and in these three jurisdictions the Secretary, Don Domingo Sousa, remained with the Governor and the alcalde, to whom other persons were occasionally called to sit in judgment. The testamentary dispositions of Vidal, as he died auditor of war, were dependent on the military court, and the case of Villaseca and Guilkes on the finance; and thus both remained in the jurisdiction of the Governor, and in the office of Sousa.

OBSERVATION 4.

In 1820, Lieutenant Colonel Don Carlos de Ville died, and, as a military man, his testamentary disposition was subject to the court of the Governor, and consequently to the office of the Secretary, Sousa: these papers, therefore, not having been in the archives of the alcaldes, could not be taken from them.

OBSERVATION 5.

The province was delivered over, on the 17th July, to the commissary of the United States. The Spanish alcalde delivered over all the papers of his archive and jurisdiction, by inventory, to another alcalde, whom Don Andrew Jackson named to receive them; and this last did not receive the said papers from the former; therefore, they could as little be taken from him.

OBSERVATION 6.

Nothing was delivered over from the office of Sousa, either to an alcalde named by Jackson, or to any other person, either on the 17th or afterwards; therefore, it is fully proved that such papers were not taken from any of the places from whence they are supposed to have been taken.

These are not the first or second falsehoods which, in the discharge of his duties as commissary for receiving Florida, Don Andrew Jackson has forged to provoke disorders, and to compel me to what it required all human prudence in me to shun; which appears well established in the official correspondence which he has held with me.

Although the reason why the papers of the office of Sousa were not delivered over on the 17th July is here of no consequence, as Don Andrew Jackson, neither as commissary of the United States, nor as Governor of Pensacola, is judge of the residence of a commissary in relation to the functions committed to him by Spain, and as he had nothing else to do but to ask of me whatever he thought it his duty to receive, as comprehended in the treaty, and, in case they were not given to him, to represent it to his Government, to which it belonged to exhibit to mine what it might think necessary, and be confident of satisfaction; nevertheless, I shall express it.

They were not delivered over because they consisted of testaments of soldiers who were not in Florida, and it had not been stipulated that all Spaniards should be prevented from representing their rights in their respective and natural tribunals; nor was it a thing which, in any point of view, interested, or could interest, the United States, in suits of judicial recoveries by the finance, and of shipwrecks and arrivals of vessels, of which the cases were deposited in the national bureaux, and were passed to those of the Havana; but these papers were not yet withdrawn and sent to any part out of Florida, because, with those of the official correspondence of the secretary's office of the Government, which I still left in the charge of the secretary, I had detained them with me under my power and authority as commissary for Spain, because, if any doubt was raised whilst I remained with this charge, as I was remaining to manage it in the way my duty demanded, and having concluded the whole, to make the proper use of them, when the period should arrive for me to withdraw.

Proof that the Secretary (Sousa) did not keep the papers concealed, but also that, at the very time, it was next to impossible that he could conceal them.

OBSERVATION 1.

Sousa kept them in the proper place, where the rest were kept. The first time that they were asked for by those three persons, strangers to him, he answered that they were in his possession. He put them before them, and also all the other papers which were with them in his care, and permitted them to examine both at their discretion, telling them finally, that, if any of them were wanted, they should ask them of me. And could any mortal, any honest man, act with greater candor? That Sousa acted thus, appears confessed by those three persons, in the account which they gave in writing, and it is evident in the trial which they held on the same day. It is therefore seen that Sousa neither kept them concealed, nor thought of concealing them.

OBSERVATION 2.

After the delivery of the province had been made, the quadron Merced, the daughter of the deceased auditor, Vidal, asked me for those testamentary dispositions to show them to lawyers of the United States, because she wished them to inform her if there was any thing in them which she could demand. I ordered Sousa to deliver them to her, and I told her, if she found any thing for her interest, that she might take a copy at her own house, to save what the secretary might require for his trouble, and that I would afterwards compare and legalize the whole, gratis. She carried them away, and she had them in her possession on the day of my apprehension and that of my subordinate. Therefore it was impossible that Sousa, or other persons, could conceal these papers, because they were in the power of one who said that she had an interest in them. With respect to the other papers, I have already related their importance, as also that he placed them in public with the greatest frankness the first time they were asked of him.

Upon a view of the whole that precedes, which has been expressed in the utmost truth, and on an examination also of what will afterwards appear in the returns made in writing, which corroborate and increase the others, the most scanty light of reason will be convinced that the whole is rational, that the opinion was correct of those ideas published before the people being purposely falsified, and the successive steps to appear in their color and sanction conspiring in a very fatal project against innocence.

The most favorable construction that can be given by prudence to those proceedings is, to attribute them to the effects of some lofty and frantic passion. If he assumes upon that authority an anxious desire that his name should make a noise in society, and because other opportunities did not offer in which his existence could be remembered, this excuse had been precipitated to bring him into view; for, in fact, under whatever color it was viewed, the subjecting that which, in its execution, was enforced by the shameful imprisonment, in the face of the world, of the commissary of a friendly nation, and with such impunity, finding it within the period in which he was proceeding to the execution of a stipulation of a solemn treaty of amity and settlement, is not a common occurrence, and, therefore, calls the attention of society towards the man who is capable of depending upon that.

Observations, elucidations, and circumstances, which afford proof of the nullity, illegality, and bad aspect in which the judicial operation has been viewed, which was executed by Don Andrew Jackson and his three officers against the commissary for the Spanish Government, Colonel Don Jose Callava, in the afternoon and night of the 22d day of August of the current year.

OBSERVATION 1.

The numbers 1 and 2, by which the answers begin, immediately indicate the treachery of the project, if attention be paid to the tortuosity of their commencement, and they also show that the alcalde, Brackenridge, went in that path by joint concurrence and design with Don Andrew Jackson, and not as an impartial man, in the execution of his authority. It is proved, also, because if he took Don Domingo Sousa for a private individual, he assumed in himself all the authority compared with him, if the demand of the papers was a subject of justice, and there was no necessity for that of Don Andrew Jackson; for if he had recourse to him as Governor, who had assumed the powers of the Captain General of the island of Cuba and Intendant, the alcalde knew very well that neither of them exercises judicial power by the law over private individuals. Therefore, Brackenridge, as well as Don Andrew Jackson, who took up the matter, knew that the claiming of those papers was not a subject of justice, and that it was in the political course of discharging the duties of commissaries named for the execution of the stipulation in the treaty, and that, being with Don Domingo Sousa, they depended upon my power and the proceedings subject to it; but, to pursue the project, they made a mixture of a disguised nature.

The numbers 3, 4, and 5, relate to the candor of Sousa, in having placed before the commissioners all the papers which he then had in his care, and informing them that he could not make use of them without my order, because he was subordinate, and also that they should ask them of me; therefore, they then could entertain no doubt in this case, although they had formerly pretended ignorance; but, notwithstanding, in spite of what they saw of the impossibility of their being able to conceal their knowledge, it appears in No. 6, that, without proceeding to the proof of whether what Sousa had shown them was true or not, that, upon a view of the result, they might prosecute the matter, or apply to me; that, leaving this precise path of the law and of the whole proceeding known to be regular, because it did not suit their projected mode, they returned to demand that Sousa should give them up, who, pursuing his duty in the most precise manner, insisted that they should direct their demand to me.

OBSERVATION 3.

In the 7th number Don Andrew Jackson did not address me by word or writing; he commanded my subordinate to be seized because he did not violate the confidence reposed in him by his chief. He did not hesitate to trample upon an ancient and well-deserving officer of the armies of a friendly nation; and, lastly, he confounds him with the greatest impunity and injustice, by insulting him in his person, innocence, society, and his nation.

If it is asked why Don Andrew Jackson preferred this procedure to the regular mode of addressing the Spanish commissary, the imagination, the penetration, and the prudence of man will be unable to discover the reason.

OBSERVATION 4.

In numbers 8 and 9, the officer, Don Domingo Sousa, appears already taken, and in the presence of Don Andrew Jackson, and that without my having the least notice; that he was treacherously asked to give testimony by answering with the monosyllable yes or no, (a sort of limitation unknown until now in all the laws established by men.) What he answered, or did not answer, was done from the rigor of his situation, to please the fancy of his oppressor. What he answered was written, or not written, because one only of those who surrounded him understood the Spanish language, and he, being the only interpreter and secretary, gave credit to himself, and the others did not know what was asked of Sousa, nor what he answered, nor did Sousa know what the other wrote; and, lastly, having understood that the papers had been carried to my house, he finished with him by committing his prisoner to jail. Here I omit referring to the circumstances of the papers, because I have already discussed that with truth in another place.

By the 10th number, it appears for the sole fact of Sousa having said that he had carried the boxes of papers to my house before Don Andrew Jackson asked me for them, or claimed them from me in any way, that for that simple act of going to claim them from the commissary of a friendly nation, and to claim papers of that importance, he ordered to prepare a large party of troops, and furnished them with ammunition as if it were for an action in war. But this is not the most singular thing; for its commander had to go five hours afterwards to receive orders, (five hours are mentioned, because at half-past three he made Sousa a prisoner, and that was the course he pursued.) I call attention to this circumstance for a future occasion; but I will mention by the way, that of all the occurrences with Sousa, in the morning of the 22d, and of these orders of Don Andrew Jackson I was ignorant, as I was dining at the table of Colonel H. M. Brooke, with all the Spanish officers and other persons, at a public feast which that Colonel, the most friendly of his nation and of men, had given for the sole purpose of entertaining us as Spanish soldiers, and from attention to my official situation and character; and I also was making the necessary arrangements for entertaining Don Andrew Jackson, his friends, and the officers of the United States, a few days afterwards—a satisfaction which I might have enjoyed on the day subsequent to the occurrence.

OBSERVATION 6.

In the 11th number he is seen to give the order for my imprisonment, without endeavoring to inquire the least thing of me, or making any claim, by word or writing; and this proves that Don Andrew Jackson well knew, by his own duty, that to ask papers of me from those which depended upon the obligations of my official situation, and to demand them of me with violence in a strange manner, was a natural cause why I should forbear giving them, and should require the precise method in him that I might fulfil my own duty; and thus it is that, the design being to seize me, he commanded it to be done, by giving that as a reason, before hearing or knowing any thing from me.

OBSERVATION 7.

By the 12th number, it appears that the demanding of them from me by judicial process was committed to three persons, but that, in place of the secretary, who had been present at, and acted in, the former proceedings against my subordinate, Sousa, a surgeon, named Bronaugh, was appointed, who is of the family of Don Andrew Jackson, and a man the best suited to his ideas, and subservient to them; and this exchange was certainly formed from a belief that the person and proceedings of the secretary were not suited for the deeds which ensued.

OBSERVATION 8.

In the 13th number I am seen in the presence of Don Andrew Jackson, without knowing why he brought me there, because this had been conveniently concealed, and it was also convenient to fabricate other causes. Here it is necessary that the empire of reason and of justice should display to the horror of mortals, the facts which may convince them of the falsehood, perfidy, and treachery of the three commissioners, and, at the same time, the authority which had induced them to such proceedings.

In the 13th number, already cited, they say "that they had been at my house, and had not found me there; but that, having returned a little after, they found me accompanied by a number of Spanish officers, dressed with their swords by their sides." What is there upon earth so sacred as not to have been insulted and profaned by creatures who, without the least shame, conceal from those who know that it cannot be concealed, all that the same persons did in the house of Colonel Brooke, and which I have related in my deposition? They also conceal my answers, and the Governor (Don Andrew Jackson) conceals the representations and entreaties which I made, by my aid-de-camp, and the interpreter, Alva; and, lastly, by the officer whom I sent with a lieutenant colonel, which he must have received. And why is that which happened in Brooke's house, in the presence of eighteen or twenty respectable persons, in the very act of meeting them at table, principally concealed? It has already been mentioned that they concealed the insult which they offered in that house to a deserving and respectable citizen of the United States, and such a concourse of persons, to whom, in every point of view, consideration was due, finding them assembled in the act of dining; and it was also concealed to introduce the paradox that the officers had on their swords. (Should they not have had them, when they were dressed in uniform, in that house, and in a becoming act, in company with their chief, and when they went from thence, accompanied by other persons, to his house, which was situated thirty or forty paces from that of Brooke?) What can be expected from men who, in the exercise of judicial proceedings, conceal, on one side, what they do with so much impudence, and, on the other, falsely fabricate criminal ideas against innocence, as will appear in continuation?

Number 13 also says "that the demand of the papers was formally made to me and refused by me." Here, also, they conceal the verbal manner in which it was made to me, and the tenor of yes or no, and come with us; and the regularity of my answer, which I do not repeat, as I have already mentioned it in my deposition.

The same number also states "that, when they informed me that my refusal would be considered as setting the authority exercised by the Governor at defiance, and they asked me again, I persisted in refusing to give them up." This relation is entirely false, and their very words show it. In the first place, they omit having any reference to my entreaties and assurances to Don Andrew Jackson, requesting him to ask them, by writing, in the regular course, and that he should immediately have them, if they were to be given to him, or the clearest explanations why they could not be given; and I do not think that this answer was a defiance to him, either as commissary or governor. But I have formally established that no such word was ever spoken to me, nor did they expend more words upon me than those expressed in the relation; and that thirteen impartial persons were present, men of probity, and most honorable in the eye of the law.

The 13th number also says "that, upon my determined refusal to give the papers, these commissioners were about to retire, and that at that moment I declared that, if they would furnish me with a copy of the memorandum of them, I would deliver them, and that they agreed; that Brackenridge gave it me, and informed me that in two hours afterwards he would come for them."

In fact, he gave me the note which I have mentioned in the deposition; and my answer, when he brought it to me, was, that I would have it translated, and would answer it. That of the confession is false, and the following affords proof of it.

The 13th number likewise asserts that, at the appointed hour, they came for the papers, (and they came with a strong party of troops, sent for a seizure, with or without the papers, as will presently appear,) and here observe the proof of the forged confession; because, if they came for papers, which I had offered to give, for what purpose did they bring troops with them? for, in order to receive papers of that importance, or otherwise, there was no necessity for them; but they brought them, not to search for papers, as will hereafter appear.

Now, they likewise, in this number, confess that they also forced the house, the door of which was open; that they found me in my chamber, in bed, &c., &c.; for all the rest which it recites is so much fiction, as the circumstance of Brooke's house has been concealed, for all the act from entering into my chamber, (it was not necessary to seek for lights as they were there,) consisted in what I have related in my deposition, except that they ordered the troops to charge; and this is the truth, but it is not true that I said, even once, that they should not take me out of my house alive, for I had no idea of saying so, nor was I desirous that they should assassinate me with impunity.

It is also true that the boxes of all classes of papers were in my chamber, and the money chest. But they suppress the observation which I made to them, that, if the taking them prevented the consequences which I was persuaded were about to ensue, they should immediately have my good-will, and the boxes, the trunks, and my whole house should be at their disposal; that they might take what they wanted; (this was said in a suppliant manner, and in the presence of several persons.) They then did not wish the papers, when they could take them away, because they were not those which they were in search of, which, if they had been, it was more in order to violate in my presence the sanctuary which kept them, because, at least, the deed left no suspicion of other cares than to violate it in my absence the following day, (and without any person to represent me,) and to take possession of my house for a whole night, because I gave place to it, especially when I left in disorder all that was within its walls. These papers were not, to appearance, concerned with the course of the transactions, because, in important circumstances, there appeared to be, in no case, any such foreign and clamorous necessity, but the pretext of them prevented the certain advantage of the bold attempt, as will afterwards appear.

OBSERVATION 9.

In the 14th number, the list of the papers is presented, and the 15th number relates what was done with me in the presence of the Governor, and mentions the questions which he put to me, and my answers.

It may be observed that it is not known how, in a population where, in one hour after sunset, not one solitary person was seen in the streets, Don Andrew Jackson had such great numbers of all classes and ages assembled with him, after eleven o'clock, in a very dark night; for those crowds, only knowing (as they did know) all that was resolved on, and was to be transacted on that day with the Spanish commissary, might have been assembled to observe so singular a novelty; but prudence advises that the opinion of that assemblage should be, that it originated from the outcries from the balconies, or other intimations of a similar nature, because, the commissary of a friendly nation was about to be sent to prison as an accomplice or the author of abstracting papers from certain archives; for that was the idea which passed current about the imprisonment of the officer Sousa. Let us return to the questions and answers.

It appears, in the first, that, whilst I was protesting, in order to answer afterwards, I was not permitted to come to that point; and, also, it appears that the manner of his preventing me is concealed.

In the second, it is observed that he again interrogated me as in the first, but his confining me in my answer to the bare words yes or no, is concealed.

In the third, it appears that I was accused, among other things, of being associated with individuals who had concealed papers to carry them out of the country, and that I was tried solely in the capacity of a criminal. I observe here that nothing of this interrogatory and charge was mentioned to me by the interpreter; but that these criminal motives and dishonest actions, which the Governor detailed to the public against my person, were the cause of that surprise in the surrounding people, (to which I have made reference in my deposition;) and, therefore, he appears here justified in the opinion of good men for having sent me to prison; besides, my person had been very much offended by the mouth of the Governor and the proceedings of the false interpreter.

In those proceedings (which are the only ones which have taken place) no person appears to have accused me; therefore, the Governor has falsified that to accuse me of such crimes against my honor; and against him the calumny is proved.

It is said that in my reply I declined answering, except in the manner which I considered proper to my place, and doing it with my hand. And now it appears that, viewing me as a criminal, as a witness, or as a man interrogated in a judicial trial, I asked nothing else but the legal right of men, acknowledged in every society; but it also appears, with the trembling of humanity, that I was absolutely refused, and he was solicitous not to hear me in any way, passing, in order to avoid it, to the examination of my steward.

It may also be observed that, in the two interrogatories, they could not be changed for about two hours, which was the time in which Don Andrew Jackson addressed to me what is above related; and that all was concealed by that minister of justice, only secretary, only alcalde, and only interpreter in the whole transaction; that the other two persons and Don Andrew Jackson did not know what he asked me, or what I answered, and that he wrote what he pleased; but the most particular thing is, that my declaration being written in English, he did not read it to me, nor require me to sign it; and it was very well, for as he knew what he had written, that was all that was necessary. I shall go no further, to avoid being too diffuse, and because it does not appear to be necessary, inasmuch as I presume I have already proved all that was necessary concerning the illegality and fatal aspect of the proceeding.

In the 16th number it appears that I was sent to prison with my confidential servant. On the 18th, the quadroon, Merced Vidal, declares that the papers had been given to her, (as the deposition mentions.) On the 19th, the boxes were ordered to be broken, and their contents to be taken out, without my being present, or any person to represent me. On the 20th, they were broken; and on the 21st, I was ordered to be set at liberty, the papers, as they say, having been found in my possession in the boxes. If, therefore, they were abstracted from the archives of the alcaldes, or concealed in any other manner, maliciously, by private individuals, in order to take them out of the province, why have they not instituted a criminal suit against me?

OBSERVATION 10,

And a review of the preceding, which prove the total impossibility of the Spanish commissary having been able to avoid those scandalous events, by not meeting the project, and the steps which ensued in pursuance of it, in course of foresight, prudence, suffering, and political sacrifices.

As soon as, by the first premeditated transaction, and Sousa's consequent showing the papers, whom they knew to be the Secretary, the circumstance of their having been robbed from the archives of the alcaldes was feigned; then, although this does not appear in the transaction, because it was afterwards concealed in them, it will here produce conviction. On the foundation of said circumstance, the seizure of Sousa was commanded, when he said that I had put them in his possession, and the writ confirmed it, and then my official situation was disavowed; and an understanding with me was absolutely refused, until the party was ready which was to put me in prison as an abstracter of these papers, or an accomplice; because, if I delivered them to justice as a private individual, the judicial proceeding against me was secure; and if I did not deliver them, I was seized for not doing it; but, as I wished to remove that circumstance, if I were heard by writing, under any character, every effort was used to avoid hearing me, that my constancy might give way. The demanding of them from me in that manner, and under the character of a private person, was persisted in; because, if it could be obtained that I would give them up from the persuasion that I might thereby avoid confusion, and save an injury to the nation to which I belonged, and also the official correspondence, it resulted that my proceeding might belong to my official situation, might appear in accordance with that criminal and base circumstance, and then the project might be effected with greater degradation, under a better appearance and with less responsibility; so it is that, without that recourse, (which at first appears to have been adopted as a political agreement to save scandal, and the other papers,) I was set at liberty.

Here I have given the projected machination, and the extremities to which I was reduced by it, without the power of making greater sacrifices than those of stopping the torrent of my feelings, and giving an example to the agents around me of moderation, and also to a people who felt the execution of those atrocities in my person. I owe all to the nation to which as its creature I belong, and, therefore, whatever is most sacred of the dignity of man, which has been violated in me with impunity, I have sacrificed as a debt due to it.

In the proceedings the declarations have been concealed which were cunningly and perfidiously received from the persons who had been tried by the alcaldes in the investigation whether the papers had ever been in their archives, and other informations whilst I was a prisoner; and finding by the results that nothing could be obtained against me, and that now the intention, if it was to obtain possession of my papers, or to make a noise in the world, was gained, I was taken from prison, as has been seen. But previously the mandate of the judge was not obeyed, who put in execution the law of habeas corpus in favor of my person, because it was opposed by Don Andrew Jackson and his three creatures during those last perfidious inquiries.

Testimony respecting bad Interpretation.

The undersigned, being acquainted with the English and Spanish languages, make their appearance before you. That, on the night of the twenty-second current, they were present at the judicial act which Don Andrew Jackson, the Governor of this place held against you, and that they took special and exact notice that what you alleged in your defence, by the explanations which you made, was not faithfully interpreted; that what was interpreted of all your narrations was very little, and very imperfectly interpreted; that, likewise, in that public act your person was grievously insulted by the Governor, and that those scandalous reasons of his were not interpreted to you, leaving them therefore undisputed by you, and, consequently, he who exhibited them may be unpunished for them before justice; and, in the opinion of the by-standers, who were only acquainted with the English language, you were convicted of atrocious deeds which we know to be as foreign from you as they are peculiar to a few of the most abandoned characters. We give you this information in defence of the most sacred things, and which all men ought to protect, even when not called upon in their defence. As we swear, we are ready to prove and make appear the solemn truths which we have related. Be assured that the same interpreter will find it impossible to deny it, because the interpretation was so extremely faulty.

Declaration of many respectable witnesses of what passed with Sousa, Fullarat, and Callava.

We, the undersigned, were present as eye and ear witnesses on the twenty-second day of the month of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, at the events which we are about to express hereafter, which happened on the said day, in the city of Pensacola, and were enforced by the Governor of it, Don Andrew Jackson, against the Spanish Colonel, Don Jose Callava, ex-Governor of the same place, and commissary residing there on the part of Spain, charged on its part with the entire accomplishment of what was stipulated by the King of Spain with the President of the United States of America in the cession made to them of West Florida by the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, which both ratified on the twenty-second of February of the same year.

Being assembled at four in the afternoon of yesterday, the twenty-second current, at table, dining with the Colonel of the troops of the fourth regiment of the United States line, Don George M. Brooke, present at the same table with his wife, and also the citizens of the same nation, Don Michael Kearney, commander of the vessel of war Enterprise, Judge Eligius Fromentin, and the said Spanish Colonel, Don Jose Callava—an officer of the United States presented himself, guarding the Spanish sub-Lieutenant, Don Domingo Sousa; he requesting to see the commissary, his chief, who made him enter; and in presence of all Sousa said "that they were conducting him to a prison." The commissary asked him for what cause, and he answered in the following terms:

"Sir, yesterday three American citizens came to my house, demanding of me, with authority (as they said) of the Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, that I should deliver them certain civil causes of the military jurisdiction and of the finance, which they had been told were in my possession. I had some boxes, with papers of the military tribunal and of that of the finance, which you had put under my care for their preservation, till they should be sent to the Havana with those of the secretary's office. That those papers had been put into boxes by me, and that it appeared to me that those which they sought were among them; which knowledge I possessed, because I had spent many years in this place, under the orders of former Governors, and of you, in the office of secretary, (or evidence may now be of my presence in both courts,) and I was in the exercise of it on the 17th of July, when you delivered over the province. That I was your subaltern, subject to your immediate orders in your commission; and, therefore, without your express order, I could deliver nothing: for which reason, I represented to them that they should make their request to you. The three persons mentioned went away, and after a short space they paid me another visit, with the same demand in writing, and requiring me to answer it in the same manner. I did so; and this morning, having gone to you to communicate it, I did not find you in the house, and my mind told me to place those boxes there immediately. I carried them and placed them in your apartment, in the charge of your servant, and I gave him a message to deliver to you the moment you came in, if I did not see you before; but in a short time, I having informed you in the street, you answered me that it was well. My house was presently searched by the same three persons, and they told me that, unless I delivered the papers, I must go to prison. I answered that the boxes were in your house; and they are carrying me to prison."

The commissary, Don Jose Callava, made his aid-de-camp rise from table, and ordered him to inform the Governor, from him, that the officer, Don Domingo Sousa, was his subaltern, and dependant on his commission; that, therefore, he had the honor of acquainting him with it, and of requesting him that, if the papers which he demanded from Sousa were relative to the degree of the treaty, or other reasons connected with it, he would have the goodness to direct himself to him as now commissary, or as former Governor; because every paper of the office of Governor, or which might have relation to his commission, could be delivered by no other but himself; and that, in pursuing the regular course, and the regularity with which he had attended to harmony and concord with him, he was always disposed to give him every accommodation. The aid-de-camp brought back for answer that Sousa was in prison, and that he should tell Colonel Callava that he would also put him into the same prison.

The Spanish commissary mentioned to those at table that his explanations had been badly interpreted to the Governor, and he ordered the same aid-de-camp to return, accompanied by another officer and the public interpreter, to acquaint him anew with the same explanations, because the reply was not a consequence of them, and might be the origin of a great mistake.

The aid-de-camp, the officer, and the public interpreter, returned, bringing the same answer; but stating that it had been given them in a loud voice, in the presence of several persons, by telling them Colonel Callava shall go to prison.

The Spanish commissary said, unmoved, yet with wonder, that he knew not to what he could attribute what he had experienced from the Governor, and insisted in the belief that some great mistake had been made in the interpretations; and stated that he would go and see the Governor when he should rise from table: but, before that time came, three persons, habited like countrymen, presented themselves in the house of Colonel Brooke, demanding, by order of the Governor, that he should immediately give up the papers which had been demanded of Sousa, and that it was unnecessary to use other modes or considerations than what might be used with any private individual.

The Spanish commissary gave them for answer that they might advise the American commissary and Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, in the first place, that it was impossible that he did not know his official situation on the part of Spain in what had been confided to him under the treaty; also, that he had received West Florida from him as the Spanish commissioner to deliver it; that he had also found him Governor in it; and how could he be ignorant that his continuance till that day, with his Secretary and other officers depending upon his commission, was waiting for the determination for which they had consulted their respective Governments about the meaning which ought to be given to the second article of the treaty, with regard to the artillery which was deposited under safeguard? And, lastly, how could he be ignorant, also, that the papers or other documents relative to the office of Governor, or which were to be delivered over by the treaty, could not be delivered to any one by him under the simple character of a private individual, because they had not thus come into his possession, nor yet had they been deposited in his care as a private individual? that he was surprised at what was then going on; that his papers were sacred and protected in Pensacola, along with his person, under the immunity of the law of nations, which has always been so protected, defended, and respected, between civilized nations, in respect to the individuals of each other mutually commissioned by them with the charges of their respective Governments; that, nevertheless, he knew not what the papers were, ordered to be delivered in that way; that he repeated the request for the third time to the Governor and Commissioner, Don Andrew Jackson, that he might be the better informed, according to his official situation, and in conformity with the peace and harmony reigning between Spain and the United States and their respective citizens—a peace and harmony which had always been so much respected and observed with particular consideration by the Spanish commissary to Don Andrew Jackson, as an individual of the United States, as well as commissary on their part, and as Governor of West Florida; and had been also constantly observed by Governor Callava (when he was so) to all the citizens of the United States, indiscriminately, and who had arrived in West Florida in the time of his government; that Don Andrew Jackson might be sure, both as commissary of the United States, and as Governor of Pensacola, that whatever papers were to be delivered to him on that day would be facilitated to him immediately by the proper course which they ought to pursue in the regular execution of both their duties.

The commissioners went away with very little good-will, and the Spanish commissary told the by-standers that he felt himself attacked with a deadly pain which he suffered, and that they would permit him to retire to his house, which he did, accompanied by them.

Immediately on his arrival, he caused his secretary to extend an official letter to the Governor, making in it all the explanations which have been related, and its contents were read to those who accompanied him, and he delivered it to a Spanish Lieutenant Colonel, requesting that, accompanied with another officer, he would deliver it to the Governor, Don Andrew Jackson; which gentleman would not receive it, after the greatest entreaties of the bearers, according to the information given by them when they returned with it and delivered it to the commissary, who was indisposed; and about seven in the evening those same three persons came to his house, requesting that he would deliver the papers as a private individual, or that he would accompany them to the house of the Governor. He answered them that his health at that time would not permit him to go into the street; that the papers, of the nature of which he was still ignorant, could not be delivered in any other way than as claimed from the Spanish commissary under the treaty, or as from the Governor, the functions whereof he had exercised; because, being in boxes, (as was mentioned,) they must necessarily belong directly, either to the office of Governor, or else to the financial or military branch; whatever civil papers were in the ordinary court having been delivered by the constitutional alcalde, and also the registers, to the United States commissary, Don Andrew Jackson; but yet they should, at least, inform him in writing what class of papers those which they demanded belonged to, as they had hitherto demanded of him papers without his knowing what they were.

The three persons went on, and about an hour afterwards, one of them returned with a half sheet of paper written in the English language, and told the Spanish commissary that in it were mentioned the papers; that they were ordered to deliver it to him precisely as to a private individual, and that he was recognised in no other light.

The Spanish commissary answered that, after the paper had been translated, he would read and answer it. Upon this, the person who had brought it went away, and he immediately ordered it to be translated by the interpreter. He threw himself upon the bed; and a while afterwards, having found some rest, a large party of troops, commanded by an officer, and under the orders of the same three persons, because they found the principal door shut, scaled the house, breaking the fence; some soldiers, with drawn bayonets in their hands, entered the chamber, and the three persons with them. He sat up in the bed, and, directing his discourse to one of the three who acted as interpreter, said: "Now that the asylum of my house is of no avail to me as a man and a citizen; that the official situation which I have in West Florida, for Spain, is also of no avail to me; nor the character of my office, nor the asylum of the immunity which I possess in the territory of the United States, by its laws and by the rights of nations, I throw myself upon their Government, and solemnly protest, before God, before this very Government, and before men, against the author of such great violations of justice."

One of the commissioners answered that he came with express orders from Governor Don Andrew Jackson to demand of him in that act that he should deliver to him the papers already mentioned in the note, or to bring him prisoner by force; and for that produced his orders.

The Spanish commissary answered that the note had been given to the interpreter to be translated, and that it had not yet come; that he was unwell; and how could he attempt to take him from his house at that hour? but if he could avoid the execution of any similar acts only at the expense of the three persons opening the trunks and boxes of the Spanish commissary, and taking from them those papers which they demanded, or what they deemed proper, that he was ready to yield to force, and that there they had the whole at their disposal. The answer which he received was, that one of the three persons entered into the chamber to the officer who commanded the troops, and the citizen Don Juan Innerarity (who speaks English) seeing the threatening act, it appeared to him that the explanation of the Spanish commissary had been wrongly interpreted, and he wished to mention it; but, upon his beginning to speak, he was commanded, with great menacing, by one of the three, to be silent; and the officer of the troops was ordered to intimate to the Spanish commissary that he might deliver himself up prisoner to an armed force. The said officer did so, and the Spanish commissary answered that he surrendered himself prisoner, but represented to him that he was sick. He answered that he was understood; he ordered him to dress and put on his coat, and in this manner he was conducted by the troops to a house in which, with a great assemblage of all classes, was Governor Don Andrew Jackson; when, by the alcalde, who acted in this business as secretary and interpreter by turns, an interrogatory was extended in writing, which the Governor dictated, and the Spanish commissary was required to answer it. He answered that he would do it immediately, but with his own hand, and in his own language, at the foot of the interrogation. This was readily granted; but, whilst he was extending it, he was forbidden to continue what he had scarcely begun.

The Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, with turbulent and violent actions, with disjointed reasonings, blows on the table, his mouth foaming, and possessed with the furies, told the Spanish commissary to deliver the papers as a private individual; and the Spanish commissary, with the most forcible expressions, answered him that he was convinced that he did not resist the delivery of papers, because he still did not know what papers were demanded of him; that, as soon as he could know it, if they were to be delivered, he would deliver them most cheerfully; and that, if papers were demanded of him which he ought not to deliver, he would resist it by the regular and prescribed means; that all these questions were not put to him in writing; that his answers were the same as he had given to every interrogatory which had been put to him, because he was not permitted to write it in his own defence; and, also, that he would answer for the future constancy of it, as well as what had been asked of him, and all that had been done to him; that he wished for this protection of the law to every man; that he would never yield.

The Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, furious, did not permit the interpreter to translate what the Spanish commissary answered, that the bystanders, it appears, might not understand it; and the interpreter made such short translations that, what the Spanish commissary took two minutes to explain, he reduced to only two words; and that when the Governor gave him time enough, (and as has been since related by various persons, who spoke both languages, of what the Spanish commissary said,) not even half was interpreted, and that little not faithfully. Lastly, the Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, after having insulted the Spanish commissary with atrocious words, took out an order, already written, and made the interpreter read it; and it contained the order for his imprisonment.

The Spanish commissary said that he obeyed it, but asked if the Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, was not afraid to put in execution deeds so unjust against a man like him; and, rising to his feet, he addressed himself to the secretary, whom the Governor kept on his right hand, and said, in a loud voice, that he protested solemnly, before the Government of the United States, against the author of the violations of justice against his person and public character.

The Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, answered to the protest, that for his actions he was responsible to no other than to his Government, and that it was of little importance to him whatever might be the result, and that he might even protest before God himself.

The Spanish commissary was committed to the armed force, and put in prison at twelve at night; his house was left open, with some soldiers in it; the keys of his trunks were not taken away; all his papers were left at discretion, and also his money, and what he had by his commission belonging to his nation; none of his officers nor any person of confidence were permitted to remain in the house; his steward also was taken at the same time.

At eleven in the morning of this day, several of the undersigned went to the United States judge, Don Eligius Fromentin, soliciting a writ of habeas corpus to liberate the person of the Spanish commissary, Colonel Don Jose Callava, which was duly issued; but the Governor, Don Andrew Jackson, despised the said writ, and replied that it was not proper to carry it into effect.

The relation which we have given is what we were present at; is exactly the most sacred truth, and, therefore, we solemnly swear to it, that it may be for the defence of law and justice wherever the knowledge of it may come. Pensacola, August 23, 1821.

[Documents relating to the arrest of Domingo Sousa, Colonel Jose Callava, and Antoine Fullarat.]

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

I learn from the most satisfactory evidence that a number of documents relating to estates in this place, and to suits instituted here, are in possession of an individual of the name of Domingo Sousa; these papers properly belong to this office, but were not included in the inventory delivered by the late Governor. Some of the circumstances attending the affair are of a very peculiar nature; but, as the necessity of obtaining possession of the documents is urgent, I must defer making a report respecting them to some other period. At present, I must request your Excellency to authorize some one to make a regular demand of the said documents, and to ascertain precisely what they are. I am, respectfully, &c.

His Excellency the Governor to Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE,

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: Having been officially informed that there are a number of papers or documents in the possession of an individual of the name of Domingo Sousa, of a public nature, and which belong to the office of the alcalde of this town, although not delivered with the other documents relating to private property, you are hereby authorized and instructed to proceed to the dwelling of the said Domingo Sousa, and to make a demand of all such papers or documents as may be in his possession. In case the said Sousa should refuse to exhibit and deliver the same, you will immediately report the fact to me in writing.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

From the Commissioners, Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR: At an early hour yesterday morning we repaired to the dwelling of Domingo Sousa, and explained to him the object of our visit, and the authority with which we were clothed. He immediately produced two boxes, containing papers, declaring that they belonged to the military tribunal and to the revenue of Spain. On examining the said papers, it appeared that, with a few exceptions, they related to courts-martial, and to personal disputes between officers and soldiers, cognizable by the military tribunals. But the following papers we conceive to be of a different nature: the proceedings relating to the estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal, formerly Auditor of War of this province, and whose heirs reside in this place. They relate to property and claims in this country; and whatever the Spanish laws may be on the subject of the military privilege by which the military courts have sole cognizance in all cases where persons of that profession are in any way interested, yet in this case the persons now interested have nothing to do with the Spanish Government. Another package contains the papers in the case of Peter Guilkes against Thomas Villaseca, which relate to real property that has passed into other hands. There are, also, the papers in the case of Manuel Bonfay against Carlos de Ville, relating to a lot of ground in Pensacola; also, the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra, relating to real property here, and in which other parties are now interested. These are all the papers we conceive important to the inhabitants here, excepting some cases of admiralty jurisdiction, and one as late as 1813, but which appear to be principally copies, the originals having been sent to Havana. After having examined the whole of the papers in the possession of the said Sousa, we made a demand of the foregoing, but he refused to deliver them, declaring that he was merely the servant of the late Governor Callava, who had placed them in his hands, and that, without an order from him, they could not be given to us. We then made a formal demand in writing, and which is annexed to this report; and the same evening we received his answer, hereto annexed. We then prepared the annexed letter for the 22d; but when presented to him by Colonel Miller and H. M. Brackenridge, he declined receiving it, stating that he had no control over the papers; that Colonel Callava was the person of whom they must be demanded; and therefore refused to receive any letter from them. He further stated that he had communicated the demand to Colonel Callava, who told him to answer by simply stating that he was subordinate to his (Callava's) orders. He said that, in order to relieve himself from the responsibility of keeping the papers, he was about to deliver them to the late Governor.

JOHN MILLER.

His Exc'y ANDREW JACKSON, &c.

From Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller to Mr. Sousa, (referred to in the above report.)

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

SIR: We have this day been authorized and instructed by His Excellency General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, to require of you to deliver up certain public documents, which no private individual has a right to keep, as they relate to the rights of persons holding or claiming property in this province. Among those papers it is believed there are the documents relating to the estate of Don Nicolas Vidal, whose heirs are interested in the same; also, the papers relating to a house and lot in Pensacola, which was the subject of a proceeding between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville; also, Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra, relating to a piece of ground in this place; and, also, the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca, relating to real property in Pensacola. In pursuance of our instruction, we therefore make a formal demand of the foregoing, and all other papers which relate directly to the right of private property in West Florida, and in which the inhabitants thereof are interested.

GEORGE WALTON,
Secretary of West Florida.
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE,
JOHN MILLER.

DON DOMINGO SOUSA.

Mr. Sousa to Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, (also referred to in their report.)

MESSRS. ALCALDE AND SECRETARIES: I am a Spanish officer, staying at present in Pensacola, and subject by my commission to the orders of the late Governor of this place, Don Sor. Callava; consequently, I have not under my charge, in quality of a private individual of this town, any papers which I am bound to deliver to you, in compliance with your request. It is a positive fact that I have exercised the functions of assistant witness (testigo de asistencia) for the suits in the courts of war and revenue in Pensacola, and under the Spanish Government; and that there are in my sole keeping, boxed up, some of those papers intrusted to my care by the above-named Governor, for their preservation. This is all I have to com-

God preserve you many years.

Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to Mr. Sousa.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR : Your note in reply to our demand of yesterday has been received. You are in the exercise of no civil functions under the existing Government : we, therefore, can only regard you as a private person. We do not claim any papers in your possession, or in that of any other, relating to the military tribunals, or to the revenue of the Spanish Government ; but we are certain that no individual, no matter what office he may have held under the Spanish Government, has any right to retain possession of archives or documents which relate directly to the sovereignty of this province ; and no reason can be given why such papers as concern property in this country, and which may be necessary to establish titles or assert the rights of individuals, should be withheld from the officer now authorized to take charge of them. We again make a positive demand of the papers mentioned in our note of yesterday, to wit, the documents in the case of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal ; the proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra ; also a proceeding between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville ; and the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca. These papers are known to be in your possession, and we demand to know by whose authority, as no person whatever has any right to authorize you to detain them.

It being made known to me, by the report of Colonel George Walton, secretary of West Florida, H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, and Colonel John Miller, clerk of the county court for the county of Escambia, duly authorized and appointed by me to make demand for and to receive the following documents and archives, claimed to appertain and belong to the following persons, as evidence of their real and personal rights, which are guarantied to them by and under the second article of the late treaty with Spain, and which are represented to be in the possession of Domingo Sousa, who states that these documents and papers have been placed in his charge and care by the late Governor of West Florida, Don Jose Callava, that is to say : 1st, the documents relating to the estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal ; 2d, the documents in the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra ; 3d, the documents in the case of Manuel Bonfay, and Carlos de Ville ; 4th, documents in the proceedings in the case of Peter Guilkes against Tomas Villaseca.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

We have the honor to report that we proceeded to the house of the within-named Domingo Sousa, and found that the papers referred to had been by him taken, through the aid of a negro, (as he reports,) to the house of Don Jose Callava, late Governor. The body of Domingo Sousa is herewith presented to you.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servants, Question 13. At what time this morning were the papers which had been demanded of you delivered by you, to whose order, and through what channel?

Answer. That, after the demand had been made by Colonel Walton, the alcalde, and Colonel Miller, now present, he went to Colonel Callava, and stated that he wished to free himself from the responsibility of keeping them, and that he this morning, at eleven o'clock, had them carried to Governor Callava's house by a negro belonging to Manuel Domingo, and there delivered to Fullarat, the major domo of the Governor.

Question 14. When you stated that you wished to free yourself from the responsibility of keeping the papers, what was the reply of Colonel Callava?

Answer. He said nothing.

Question 15. Do you know that Governor Callava received possession of the papers?

Answer. He does not know positively whether the Governor has received them or not. That he went with the negro, and the papers were left at the house: there was no person there but the major domo, in whose charge they were left.

Order to Colonel Butler and Doctor Bronaugh.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE,

Pensacola, August 22, 1821.

It being made known to me, by the confession of Domingo Sousa, that the papers named in the petition of Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, and which were demanded under my orders as the property of private individuals, by Colonel George Walton, secretary for West Florida, Colonel John Miller, clerk of the county court of Escambia, and Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, were, after said demand in pursuance of my orders as aforesaid was made, by the said Domingo Sousa and a negro man, carried this day to the house of the late Governor, Don Jose Callava, and delivered the said documents and papers into the possession of his steward, named Fullarat, Colonel Robert Butler, of the Army of the United States, and Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, accompanied by Henry M. Brackenridge, Esq., alcalde for the city of Pensacola, will wait upon Colonel Don Jose Callava, and his steward, named Fullarat, and demand from them the following papers this day delivered to the said Fullarat, at the house of the said Colonel Callava, by the said Domingo Sousa, that is to say: first, the documents and papers relating to the estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal; second, the documents in the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; third, the documents and papers in the case of Manuel Bonfay and

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

Carlos de Ville; fourth, documents and papers in the proceedings in the case of Peter Guilkes against Tomas Villaseca; all which documents and papers are acknowledged to be the property of individuals, and appertaining to their rights, and which are secured to them by and under the second article of the Treaty with Spain, concluded at the city of Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819, and ratified on the corresponding day of 1821, and must remain for the protection of the rights and property of the said individuals; and no officer of Spain can rightfully take them away, or keep them from the office of the duly appointed alcalde for the city of Pensacola. It is further ordered that, if the said late Governor, Don Jose Callava, or his steward, Fullarat, when the above-described papers are demanded of them, should fail or refuse to deliver the same, the said Don Jose Callava and his steward (Fullarat) be forthwith brought before me, at my office, then and there to answer such interrogatories as may be put to them of and concerning the premises, and to abide by and perform such order and decree, touching the said documents and papers secured to them as aforesaid, as the justice of the case may demand.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

Report of Messrs. Butler and Bronaugh.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR: Pursuant to your official order bearing this date, we proceeded to the house of Colonel Callava, who was absent; but again returning to his house shortly after, we found him, accompanied by a number of Spanish officers, clothed with their side-arms, and Mr. John Innerarity in the porch; the demand was formally made of the documents enumerated in your order, and peremptorily refused; when he was informed that his refusal would be considered as setting at defiance the authority exercised by you as Governor of the Floridas, in the execution of the laws, and they were again demanded, and the consequences of refusal on her part enumerated, but in which refusal he still persisted; and we were about taking our leave to prepare for the final execution of your order, when Colonel Callava declared that, if we would furnish him with a copy of the memorandum of the documents required, he would deliver them to us; to which we assented. The alcalde, H. M. Brackenridge, accordingly waited on him with a copy of the memorandum herewith accompanied, and informed him that he would call in two hours for the reception of the documents as promised. We proceeded at the appointed time, and found the gate and front part of the house closed; the former we opened by removing a bar, and, on reaching the latter, a considerable stir seemed to be making in the house; we knocked some time without receiving any answer, when admittance was demanded in the name of the Governor in three instances, still without reply; the guard was then ordered to advance and form in the front of the house, and part detached to the rear, when it was discovered that the back door was open, and several Spanish officers, with Mr. Innerarity, (who is one of your cabildo,) were on the porch. We inquired for Colonel Callava, to which we were answered, they did not know where he was; lights were procured and the rooms searched, when Colonel Callava was found in his bed, divested of his coat. Demand was then made of the documents, agreeably to his promise, and to our astonishment they were still refused, and several attempts made on his part to show that he was not amenable to the laws; to which he was answered, that the Governor was, in the execution of the laws, bound to demand the papers, as they appertained to the rights and property of individuals resident in Pensacola, and that formal complaints had been made that they were improperly withheld, and that the Governor knew no distinction between Colonel Callava and any other man under his government. We then proposed that Colonel Callava would deliver the papers, and he should have our receipt for them, which was also refused; we then again demanded them, reiterating our sentiments that his refusal would be received as an act of open mutiny to the civil authority exercised in the Floridas, and that he must expect the consequences. He persisted to refuse, and the officer of the guard was ordered to take him and Fullarat into custody, and bring them before your Excellency, which is now done. We would add, in conclusion, that Colonel Callava repeatedly asserted that he would not be taken out of his house alive; but he seemed to act without much difficulty when the guard was ordered to prime and load. A corporal and three men were detached to remain as guard in the house of Colonel Callava, and to prevent the removal of the boxes which had contained the documents, and which Mr. Brackenridge recognised in the bedroom. From the relation in which Mr. Innerarity stands in this business, together with the interest taken on the side of Colonel Callava, and at the same time exercising the functions of one of the cabildo of this city, we deem it an indispensable duty to recommend that your Excellency will fill his place in the council with a character who will manifest a proper respect for the dignity of the laws, and you their Executive.

We have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT BUTLER,
Colonel U. S. Army.
J. C. BRONAUGH.

C. Bronaugh, accompanied by H. M. Brackenridge, Colonel Callava promised to deliver to Colonel Butler, if they should be found in the boxes delivered to him by Domingo Sousa.

2. Proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

Minutes of the examination of Colonel Callava and Fullarat.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE,
Pensacola, August 22, 1821.

Colonel Jose Callava, being brought before Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, to answer certain interrogations relative to documents and papers named in a schedule bearing this date, and which relate to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas, the following interrogatories were put to him, viz :

Question 1. Were or were not the papers mentioned in a schedule handed to you by H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, delivered by Domingo Sousa at your house this day to Antoine Fullarat, your major domo; and, if so, at what time of the day?

Answer. [Translated.] I say that I solemnly protest against the act, which, at ten, in the middle of the night, took me from my bed, where I was sick, although I consider myself as Spanish commissioner, appointed by the Spanish Government, under the treaty recently concluded between the said Government and that of the United States for the cession of the Floridas, which commission has been conf—. [Here the Governor stopped Colonel Callava, and directed the following question to be put to him:]

Did or did not Domingo Sousa deliver at your house this day the papers above mentioned; and, if so, where are those papers now?—and answer this directly.

Answer. That he declines answering, except in the manner he considers proper—in his own language, and with his own hand.

The question being repeated, he answered that he was here as a commissioner, and could not answer in any other capacity; on which he was informed by the Governor that he could not view him as a commissioner, or in any other light than as a private individual charged with refusing to surrender papers which belong to the public archives of this province, and with being connected with individuals charged with being about to secrete papers and to carry them out of the country, by which the inhabitants thereof would be deprived of their evidence of property, and which, under the second article of the treaty with Spain, ought to have been delivered with the other papers placed in the charge of the alcalde for safe-keeping. The question being again repeated, he refused to answer, except in the manner before stated.

Interrogatories put to Antoine Fullarat.

Question 1. What is your name and age?

Answer. My name is Antoine Fullarat. I do not know my age.

Question 2. Did not Domingo Sousa deliver to you this day some papers in boxes at the house of Colonel Jose Callava?

Answer. Yes.

Question 3. Where are the papers now?

Answer. They are at the house of Colonel Callava.

Question 4. In whose possession are they?

Answer. They are now in Colonel Callava's house.

Question 5. At what time of this day were they delivered by Domingo Sousa?

Answer. He does not recollect.

Question 6. Are not you the major domo of Colonel Callava?

Answer. Yes.

I do hereby certify the foregoing to be a correct minute of the examination before Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, at which I acted as clerk and interpreter.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

Order for the imprisonment of Domingo Sousa, Colonel Jose Callava, and Antoine Fullarat.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE,
Pensacola, Aug. 22, 1821.

WEST FLORIDA, }
Pensacola. }

TO THE OFFICER OF THE DAY:

You will take into custody, and safely keep, Domingo Sousa, until he produces, or causes to be produced and delivered, unto Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde of Pensacola, the following documents and papers, viz: Those relating to the estate of Don Nicholas Maria Vidal; also, the papers relating to a house and lot in Pensacola, which was the subject of a proceeding between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; also, the proceedings which took place between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville, relating to a piece of ground in this place; and also the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca, relating to real property in Pensacola: all which documents and papers appear to appertain to individuals and their rights, and for their benefit ought to be in the possession of H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, and not to be taken away by the officers of Spain; and which documents and papers were seen by Col. George Walton, Col. John Miller, and H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde, in the possession of the said Domingo Sousa on the 21st inst., and demanded by the said alcalde to be delivered to him, the said alcalde, under the written order of the undersigned given for that purpose, and the said documents and papers to be retained by the said alcalde for safe-keeping; on which the said Domingo Sousa refused to deliver the same, but, in open violation of the above-recited order and demand, did convey the said documents and papers to the house of Colonel Jose

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

Callava, late Spanish Governor of the province of West Florida, and left in the hands of the said Colonel Callava's steward, by name Fullarat, in the dwelling-house of the said Colonel Callava. All which acts aforesaid of the said Domingo Sousa are in open contempt of the authority of the undersigned, as Governor of the Floridas, &c., and in open violation of the rights of the citizens, secured to them under the second article of the late treaty with Spain; for all which, and until he, the said Domingo Sousa, complies with the foregoing order, by delivering the aforesaid enumerated documents and papers, he is to stand committed to the calaboose.

Given under my hand this 22d day of August, 1821.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

To Capt. DADÉ, Officer of the Day :

You will take into custody and safely keep Don Jose Callava, and his steward, (Fullarat,) until the documents and papers recited in the order annexed for the arrest of Domingo Sousa are produced and delivered unto H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola.

Given under my hand, this 22d day of August, 1821.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 23, 1821.

SIR: Having strong grounds to believe that the documents and papers claimed by me as appertaining to the archives of this province, and directly relating to the property and sovereignty of the same, are now in the house of Don Jose Callava, but enclosed in boxes, I beg leave to request that authority may be given to such persons as your Excellency may appoint to open and examine the said boxes, and to report thereon. From the examination of Domingo Sousa and Antoine Fullarat, and the affidavit hereto annexed of Merced Vidal, there can be no doubt but that the said documents were delivered in the boxes before mentioned to the said Callava, at his house, and are in his possession. The documents demanded are as follow:

1. Papers relating to the estate of Jose Maria Vidal.
2. Proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.
3. Proceedings in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville.
4. Documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE, Alcalde.

Affidavit of Merced Vidal.

Before me, H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of Pensacola, personally appeared Merced Vidal Pardo, who, being of full age, and being duly sworn, deposeth and saith: That her father, Nicolas Maria Vidal, left her by will one of his heirs, and that he died about the year 1806, possessed of a large real and personal estate in Florida and Louisiana. The deponent further saith that the will of her said father, together with the inventories of his real and personal estate, and all the papers relating thereto, were for several years missing from the public archives of Pensacola, having been, by some person unknown, withdrawn from the same; that repeated solicitations were made by her to the authorities then existing here to compel the restoration of the said papers and documents, as they were, and she believes still are, necessary to enable her to prosecute her claim under the said will; that a certain John Innerarity, of this place, whom this deponent believes to be a debtor to the said estate to a large amount, was decreed to restore the said papers if in his possession; that the said papers were finally restored, and that a decree was passed against the said Innerarity to account with the deponent as one of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal. The deponent further states that, a few days before the change of government, she demanded them of Colonel Callava, who informed her that he could not give them up, as he was obliged to take them to Havana. The deponent afterwards requested permission to make a copy of them; that this was granted by said Callava, on condition that they should only be delivered by separate pieces on parcels, and that a confidential person should be found to copy them; but the deponent says that the expense of copying them exceeds her means, they amount in all to several hundred pages of common writing paper. The deponent afterwards learned that the said papers were in the actual possession of Domingo Sousa, who acknowledged the same, and delivered three pieces to her for the purpose of being copied. The deponent further states that the said papers relate to property in this country and Louisiana, and were necessary in order to enable her to prosecute her claims under the will of her father.

MERCED VIDAL.

Sworn and subscribed to before me, this 23d day of August, 1821,

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE, Alcalde.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE,
Pensacola, August 23, 1821.

M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, had delivered them to Antoine Fullarat, the steward of Colonel Jose Callava, and in the house of the said Callava: and whereas an order was issued by the undersigned, on said declaration of the said Domingo Sousa, that a demand should be made to Colonel Jose Callava, and his steward Fullarat, that they deliver said papers agreeably to a schedule delivered by Colonel Robert Butler, of the Army of the United States, and Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, accompanied by the said alcalde for the city of Pensacola, who proceeded and made a demand of the aforesaid papers, which Colonel Callava refused to deliver, on which an order was made to bring the said Callava and Fullarat before me, to answer such interrogatories as might be put to them, &c.; this order being executed, and the said parties before me, Colonel Callava having declined answering interrogatories put to him, except in his own way, and as commissioner of Spain for the delivery of West Florida and its dependencies, which the undersigned would not in his judicial capacity, nor could he, know him in any other than his individual capacity, brought before him on the complaint of his acts being injurious to the rights and property of individuals, and in open violation of the orders of the undersigned, and in contempt of his decrees; Fullarat, having been interrogated, declared that he received from Domingo Sousa the papers alluded to, and that the said papers in boxes were in Colonel Callava's house.

Colonel George Walton, Secretary of West Florida, Colonel John Miller, Clerk of the county of Escambia, David Shannon, Esq., presiding justice of said court, and Thomas Brownjohn, Esq., presiding justice of said court, accompanied by H. We now deliver into your Excellency's possession the papers and documents above enumerated.

Immediately upon the receipt of said order, I repaired to the guard at the calaboose, and, having communicated its contents to Colonel Jose Callava, I conducted him to his own house, where I examined two sealed boxes said to contain papers. I further attended him in the examination of his own effects, with the safety of which he appeared satisfied. I then dismissed the guard from his house, and left him in peaceful possession of it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Testimony in behalf of Colonel Callava.

We, the undersigned, declare, upon oath, that about half-past five in the afternoon of yesterday, the 23d current, we were witnesses of the examination which the Spanish Colonel, Don Jose Callava, made of his house, who, accompanied by an officer of the United States, entered it for the first time, after having been dismissed from prison, into which he had been put the night before by the Governor of this place, Don Andrew Jackson. The house was found open, and troops in it; these troops belonged to the United States, and were armed. In the Colonel's chamber we saw bundles of papers upon the table which served him for a writing desk, and these bundles neither sealed nor secured. We also saw and examined two boxes secured with nails, and sealed with black wax in various places, upon white paper, and that the seal was that which the said Colonel used in making up his despatches as Governor in Pensacola; and, for our greater certainty, the seal being upon the table, we took it and compared it with the stamp upon the wax on the boxes. We also saw and examined that one of these boxes had various broken seals, which demonstrated evidently, and convinced the human understanding beyond a doubt, that the said box had been opened after it had been sealed and nailed. We observed, also, that it was secured anew, and that close by the broken seals other seals had been put with wax of the same color as the others, but the seals were of a different figure; all this was likewise observed by the officer of the United States who assisted in the examination. We also saw that the Colonel took from his bed some large keys, and that with them he opened a strong box, and from a drawer therein he took out a bag of gold, which he emptied upon a table, and counted, by pieces of gold, in our presence, two hundred and fifteen pieces, with seven pieces of silver, and two reals more; that afterwards he returned the said money into the strong-box; on his doing which, the officer of the United States said that he had finished his business, and went away.

The relation of these facts we have thought proper to present in this declaration, as they appeared to us, accompanied by the said officer of the United States, on this examination. And for its verification we sign it, at Pensacola, the 24th day of the month of August, 1821.

A true copy:

H. DE RIVAS Y SALMON.

The Secretary of State to Don Joaquin de Anduaga.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 2, 1821.

SIR: Previous to your arrival in this country, I had the honor of receiving from Don Hilario de

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

Rivas y Salmon, then Chargé d'Affaires from your Government, a letter dated the 6th of the last month, with sundry papers enclosed, exhibiting complaints against the Governor of the Territories of Florida for certain proceedings in his judicial character against Colonel Don Jose Callava. That letter was immediately submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States, by whose directions I have now the honor of addressing you an answer thereto.

The complaints, in substance, are—

1. That Colonel Callava being a commissioner of His Catholic Majesty for delivering the province over to the United States, and entitled to the special protection of the laws of nations, his house was forcibly entered in the night time, and he himself being then sick in bed was, under special circumstances of rigor and inhumanity, summoned and compelled to go before Governor Jackson to answer interrogatories.

2. That the questions put to him, and his answers to them, were both falsely interpreted; he being ignorant of the language in which the interrogatories were put.

3. That he was finally committed to prison, and there detained for the space of a day before he was released.

4. That, during the period of his detention, his house, his property, and the papers of his Government, were left at the mercy of the soldiery; that he found, on his return to his house, the seals of his Government upon certain boxes of papers broken, and some of the papers scattered about.

I am instructed by the President of the United States to assure you of his deep regret that, in the completion of a transaction of such high importance to both nations, any circumstance to excite pain on either side should have occurred.

On the merits of the proceeding complained of, all the light necessary to the formation of a correct judgment has not been received. It would be improper, therefore, in the present case, to pronounce definitively on the subject. In its intercourse with foreign Powers, the Government of the United States is scrupulously observant of the rights of the representative character of persons charged by their Governments with the performance of any duty incident to their relations with this Union. Although Colonel Callava was not clothed with the character or credentials of a public minister, it is readily admitted that, in the execution of his trust, as a commissary for the delivery of the province, he was entitled to all the protection and all the immunities necessary for the discharge of that duty. But it is not less true that in the treaty itself it had been stipulated that the whole transaction of the surrender of the provinces, and the evacuation of all the officers of His Catholic Majesty within it, should be completed within six months from the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty; which six months had elapsed at the time when these incidents occurred. It is also true that the surrender had been completed; that the authority of Spain within the province had more than a month before ceased, and that of the United States had taken its place. The troops of His Catholic Majesty had been removed; and if Colonel Callava and other officers of Spain remained there after the consummation of that event, they could no longer claim the immunities of public agency, or any other privileges than those of strangers permitted to reside in the place—strangers not only amenable to the common judicial tribunal, but who, conformably to the Spanish laws existing before the cession of the province, would have been liable to removal from it, or to imprisonment, at the discretion of the Governor, for the mere act of being there.

It is asserted by Colonel Callava that the postponement of his departure from Pensacola had been necessary; because it was impossible for him to terminate the business incident to the surrender on that day; because he was sick; and because the question whether the artillery belonging to the fortifications was or was not included in the cession had been referred to the decision of the two Governments. To this the reply is obvious—that, without now referring to the delays which protracted till the 17th of July the surrender which might have been effected more than two months before, there was yet ample time between that day and the 22d of August for the discharge of any business incidental to it; that the personal indisposition of Colonel Callava neither disqualified him on the 17th of July from the transaction of business, nor on the 22d of August from being present at a festive entertainment, nor immediately afterwards from undertaking and performing a long and fatiguing journey from Pensacola to New York, and thence to embark on a voyage by sea; and that, with regard to the question concerning the cannon, which was reserved for the decision of the two Governments, it furnished no sufficient motive for the continuance of Colonel Callava there—a particular receipt for them having been given by Governor Jackson, and the right of Spain to remove them, whatever its merits might be, being in no manner affected by the departure of the Spanish commissioner.

It appears, therefore, that, both by the limitation of time stipulated in the treaty for the surrender of the province, and by the nature of the functions assigned by Colonel Callava, his immunities of exemption from the ordinary process of the law had ceased before the 22d of August. The allegation that Governor Jackson had, nineteen days before that time, recognised his commissarial character as yet existing, will not affect the principles here advanced: 1st. Because the limited six months had not then expired; and 2dly. Because the only transaction of General Jackson on that day, recognising Colonel Callava as a commissioner, was, by writing him a letter complaining of a signal breach of faith by that officer, in evading, on the plea of indisposition, the performance of a stipulated promise, on the morning of the 17th of July, before the surrender, and afterwards refusing to perform it at all; which letter after an expostulation against that proceeding, suited to the aggravation of its character, finished by a declaration of General Jackson that it closed the correspondence between him and Colonel Callava on the subject forever.

Far would it be from the intention of the American Government to draw within its rigorous limits the exemption from ordinary legal process of a foreign public officer. It would extend to them a liberal measure of time and a full portion of indulgence for the execution of the trust, and for departure after its completion. But it cannot perceive the justice of extending these privileges beyond their limits as sanctioned by custom, for purposes of injustice and wrong. And here we are led to the inquiry, what was the immediate occasion of the summons to Colonel Callava, his resistance against which prompted the subsequent rigorous measures, in reference to his person, house, and papers, complained of in the note of Mr. Salmon? He had withheld, and caused to be packed in boxes for transportation, public records, relating to the property of the province—judicial documents, indispensable for vindicating the titles to succession of infant and orphan children. Application was made to General Jackson, in behalf of those orphans, for the legal judicial process to obtain those papers. He had proof that they had been removed, after a summons from him to the person in whose possession they had been to produce them, to the house and possession of Colonel Callava, for the avowed purpose of subtracting them from the process issued by his authority. Had that officer's personal immunity been complete and unquestionable, what greater abuse of it could have been made than thus to wrest from the course of justice the vouchers on which depended the rights and the subsistence of orphans? General Jackson, considering that Colonel Callava was not entitled to such exemption from legal process, issued the ordinary summons which would have been applicable to any other individual; and, on his refusal to answer the interrogatories put to him, committed him, as others in like cases would have been committed, to prison. By the same order he issued a commission for securing the papers, which ought to have been delivered up before, with all suitable caution, to prevent the taking of any others, and, immediately after the satisfactory return of that commission, ordered the release of Colonel Callava. Such appears to have been the character of the transaction, upon the report of it made by General Jackson; and, although the President cannot but contemplate with unfeigned regret this occurrence, he thinks that blame should be imputed to the party deserving it, and whose misconduct produced it; and that it is a justice due to General Jackson to make him acquainted with the objections in the note of Mr. Salmon to his conduct, and to receive his full explanation of the motives and considerations which governed him.

In concluding this letter, I cannot forbear reminding you, sir, that not only this, but all the other transactions of a painful nature which have arisen in the execution of that treaty, and which it was hoped would have terminated all the differences, and have led to the most harmonious intercourse between the United States and Spain, have proceeded from the unjustifiable delays and evasions of His Catholic Majesty's officers, in direct contravention, as is understood, to his orders and intentions, in withholding the documents, archives, and vouchers, of which the delivery had been expressly stipulated—vouchers indispensable to the United States, both for the dispensation of private justice and for the establishment of public right, but utterly useless to Spain; and the detention of which, by the Captain General and Governor of Cuba, and by the Spanish Governors of both East and West Florida, however intended, and by whatever motive induced, can subserve no purposes but those of fraud, injustice, and oppression. After a succession of delays, for a period of six weeks at the Havana, in a climate noted for its unhealthiness to strangers, of the commissioner of the United States authorized to receive those documents, and of the vessel which had conveyed him, he was compelled to depart without them, nor have they yet been delivered. The attempts to carry away, both from Pensacola and from St. Augustine, many of those papers, can be viewed in no other light than as flagrant violations of the treaty. The President relies that they will be so considered by His Catholic Majesty, and that he has ere this given the most positive and effectual orders for the faithful execution, in this respect, of that instrument. I pray you, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DON JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, November 14, 1821.

SIR: I have received your note of the 2d of this month, (which I have transmitted to my Government,) in answer to a letter of the 6th ultimo, which Don Hilario de Rivas y Salmon had the honor to address to you, relative to the proceedings of General Jackson with Colonel Callava.

I can do no less than applaud the President's resolution, so worthy of his prudence, of not pronouncing definitively upon this business until he had the whole documents concerning it before him; and I flatter myself that, when that takes place, he will do ample justice to the representation of the above-named chargé d'affaires. In this persuasion I will not at present enter upon an answer to the paragraphs of your said note which seem to defend the conduct of General Jackson; and I shall defer doing this unless the President (which is not to be expected) should think it his duty to approve it.

I avail myself of this opportunity of offering you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years. Your obedient and humble servant,

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, November 18, 1821.

SIR: General Jackson, not satisfied with the outrages which he practised against Colonel Cal-

lava on the 22d of September last, has published, in Pensacola, a proclamation, in which, on the most frivolous pretexts, he has ordered that Don Marcos de Villiers, Don Bernardo Prieto, Don Luis Guayare, Don Civito Lasassier, Don Arnaldo Guillemard, Don Carlos de Villiers, Don Pedro de Vegas, and Don Mariano Latady, all in the service of His Catholic Majesty, should quit the above-named city on or before the 3d day of October following.

The reasons which he alleges for a proceeding so shocking are the following: 1st. That, by the seventh article of the treaty between Spain and the United States, of the 22d of February, 1819, it was stipulated that the officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty should evacuate the territories ceded to the United States six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, and that they should give possession of them to the officers or commissaries of the United States duly authorized to receive them; 2d. That the said officers, acting as a separate body, endeavored to sow discontent among the inhabitants; and, 3d. That they were the authors of a paper in which they criticised the proceedings which took place in the interrogatory made by General Jackson of Colonel Callava, previous to his sending him to prison.

If General Jackson, as commissary for receiving the Floridas, believed it his duty to fulfil the letter of the seventh article of the treaty, how deficient was he in that duty in permitting those officers to remain in the province more than a month after the expiration of the six stipulated. His consent and silence, during this time, afford evident proof that his opinion was, that the treaty was in no way infringed by the remaining of eight individuals after that time had elapsed; and, in truth, it being the spirit of the said seventh article to secure to the United States the peaceable possession of those territories, it is very difficult to imagine how so small a number of subjects could endanger it. Besides, if the proclamation had for its object the fulfilment of the article, why was it confined to the eight officers by name, and not extended to all those who were likewise in both Floridas?

I confess that I am embarrassed how to answer the second paragraph, because I do not know what General Jackson means by the officers acting as a distinct body. Can it be that, being subjects, and belonging to the service of a Power friendly to the United States, they were seen as companions, and were not deemed citizens of this Republic, but foreigners, who for a short time remained in its territory, under the protection of the law of nations and of treaties? In this case, the same criminality might be attached to such Americans as travel through Europe, and especially to the officers of the American squadron in the Mediterranean, who, instead of outrages, meet with a reception in the ports of Spain to which their circumstances, and the friendship which unites both nations, entitle them.

The second extreme of the second paragraph and of the third are really serious accusations, and, if it be certain that the officers, either by their actions or by their writings, would have attempted to excite discontent in the inhabitants, there is no doubt of their being criminal. With regard to their actions, it is very strange that General Jackson has not thought fit, in taking a step so precipitate, to give what still was not proof—at least, the relation of what had obliged him to declare them culpable of such a crime; and as, in the meantime, neither appears evident to me, I think myself authorized to declare the accusation to be false. With regard to the writing which he cites, the officers were free to believe themselves at liberty to publish it, since they could not but have been persuaded that they were in a country where, till lately, the Spanish laws, and now those of the United States, prevailed, and where the liberty of the press was their justification in doing it. And what did they say in the paragraph copied by General Jackson? That the interrogations were not faithfully translated to Callava—a fact which the same person who acted as interpreter in that has since confessed in a piece published in the newspapers; yet for this publication they have been expelled from the Floridas. I as little comprehend from whence arises the criminality of the passage which General Jackson copies in his proclamation, that, “if, on the one hand, they shuddered at the violent proceedings exercised against their superior, they knew also what was due to a Government which is on the most friendly footing with their own.” What does he wish them to say, but that, notwithstanding the sentiments inspired by the precipitate acts against Colonel Callava, they knew that it was their duty to submit to the decisions of a Government friendly to their own? In vain will it be pretended that the object of this writing is to rouse the minds of the inhabitants; it only relates to what took place before them all, and what has since been publicly confessed by one of the agents of General Jackson himself. There is no doubt, in fact, that the hearts of the Floridians were overwhelmed with sorrow and pain to see those outrages committed against one who had so long been their superior, and had known how to gain their affection; no doubt but that, seeing the violences committed against him, and against those who a few days before were their fellow-countrymen, they were so much the more alarmed, because they believed they were passing under the pleasant yoke of a Power, the asylum of liberty and of justice, yet had been witnesses of proceedings seldom practised in the most despotic countries. But who ought to bear the reproach of effects so natural—he who caused them, or they who deplored them?

I believe I have answered the accusations contained in the proclamation; but, in order to make the irregularity of General Jackson's proceedings more evident, I will grant for a moment that they are certain and proved; I will admit that the officers have been deserving of the chastisement and dishonor which they have suffered; but yet nobody will deny me that, before it was inflicted upon them, they ought to have been cited before the proper tribunal, have heard the charges, and have had liberty and time for their defence. These are fundamental principles of the laws of Spain, and of the United States, and of every civilized country. But what has been the conduct of General Jackson? Without giving them the least intimation, he publishes, in a language foreign to them, a proclamation expelling them from the province, giving them scarcely time to arrange their affairs, and authorizing all officers, civil and military, to apprehend them, and bring them before him!

I forbear making reflections upon a fact of such a nature, and it would be doing an injury, sir, to your sense of justice if I should dwell upon its odiousness.

In fine, either General Jackson has expelled the above-mentioned officers because he believed them criminal, (and in this case he ought to have had them judged according to the laws,) or he thought proper to do it as a political measure, in which case he ought to have executed it as the relations between the countries demand, either by giving them notice in writing, or verbally, with that urbanity which a person of his grade ought never to forget. In place of this, he was wanting either to the laws, or to the respect which was due to the officers and subjects of a Power friendly to his Government; and, consequently, I feel it my duty to request that you will have the goodness to lay this note before the President, not doubting, from his well-known justice, that he will give to His Catholic Majesty the satisfaction which the above-mentioned conduct of General Jackson towards the before-named Spanish officers demands. Whereupon, I renew to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration.

Your most obedient, humble servant,
JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

PHILADELPHIA, November 22, 1821.

SIR: By your note of the 13th of August last to my predecessor, Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, you were pleased to acquaint him that copies of the correspondence which had taken place between Don Jose Coppinger, Governor and Commissary nominated by His Catholic Majesty for the delivery of East Florida, and Colonel Butler, commissary appointed by the United States to take possession of it, had been received. Upon reading it, you cannot but applaud the zeal with which Colonel Coppinger labored to obviate and remove all the difficulties which could delay this important transaction, and the activity with which he made the aforesaid delivery, without concluding a multitude of subjects which yet remain pending, and without waiting for the term fixed by the treaty. The harmony and good understanding which prevailed between both commissaries is very praiseworthy, inasmuch as they evidently showed that, guided solely by the desire of executing their respective duties, far from throwing obstacles in the way of its accomplishment, with discussions liable to inflame the mind, they thought that urbanity and decorum were the most proper means of serving their respective Governments in the important commission with which they had been intrusted. By the aforementioned correspondence, it appears that doubts had arisen whether the artillery and certain archives ought or ought not to be delivered over to the United States, and in that you will have seen that it was clearly and definitively stipulated between Messrs. Coppinger and Butler that both should remain in St. Augustine; the former in deposite in possession of the Anglo-American commissary, and the latter in the state in which they were, and without the possibility of their being carried away to the Havana until the determination of both Governments, in a certain time, should arrive. At the departure of Colonel Butler from the said city, after the delivery had been effected, he wrote officially to Colonel Coppinger that he would have to transact his business with Captain Bell, who succeeded him; and, without doubt, from the copies of his correspondence with Colonel Coppinger, you will have observed that, on various subjects which occurred, he considered him, and interchanged letters with him, recognising him still in the quality of Spanish commissary. On the arrival of Mr. Worthington, who came to St. Augustine to supply the place of Captain Bell, the aspect of affairs was changed; and in the correspondence which took place between him and Colonel Coppinger upon an incident relative to a Spanish agent, he not only affected not to understand that Coppinger continued in the quality of Spanish commissary with the consent of his predecessors, but he was pleased to make use of expressions highly injurious to Spain, and foreign to the language which a person whom the American Government had thought worthy of its confidence ought to have used. Colonel Coppinger waited for the answer to the protest which he had made to Mr. Worthington upon the incident above mentioned; when, without any previous notice, or any other cause, the offence was committed which is related in the subjoined protests of Colonel Coppinger and of the secretary.

That the American Government had no right to demand any paper from Colonel Coppinger, is evident from the receipt of the delivery given to him by Colonel Butler on the 10th of July last, which is given for the delivery of what the treaty stipulated, and which declares expressly that the doubt relative to the artillery and certain documents was left to the determination of both Governments.

That the commissaries, Coppinger and Butler, had agreed, in virtue of their respective powers, that the archives in question should remain in the state in which they were, appears from the correspondence of both. What reason, then, what pretext, what excuse, can General Jackson and his officers give for a crime so unheard of?

From all that I have explained, and from the accompanying documents, it results—

1st. That His Catholic Majesty has been insulted, in the person of his commissary, in the most scandalous manner.

2d. That General Jackson has broken, without giving any reason for it, an agreement signed by his own officers.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

3d. That, in the spoliation, or rather plunder, committed in the house of Colonel Coppinger, the law of nations, and all the known laws of civilized countries, have been trampled upon, inasmuch as he was the commissary of a foreign Power, and inasmuch as, without summons or notice, without accusation, trial, or sentence, the doors of his house have been broken, and he has not only been robbed of his family and private papers, always sacred, but of those which, being the correspondence of office, and reserved with his Government, belong to His Catholic Majesty.

The sentiments which animate a free people, and the principles which direct those who have the high honor of governing them, are well known to you. Capable of making every sacrifice where their interest alone is concerned, they never yield when their insulted honor demands just satisfaction. That His Catholic Majesty is under the necessity of demanding it for the repeated insults offered by General Jackson, his commissaries, officers, and servants, is fully proved by my remonstrances, and those of Don Hilario de Rivas; and, to be brief, I at present demand in his royal name—

1st. That the Government of the United States show, in an authentic manner, its disapprobation of the insults offered to the Spanish commissary, Don Jose Coppinger.

2dly That the authors of them be punished as they deserve.

3dly. That all the papers, without any distinction, which were taken from the house of Colonel Coppinger, and of the Secretary, on the 2d of October, be restored to Colonel Don Jose Coppinger, who will return to St. Augustine for that purpose, that he may keep those which belong to the Spanish Government, and preserve in his possession those which have been the object of doubts, until, according to the solemn stipulation by him and Colonel Butler, both Governments come to a determination respecting them.

4thly. That the Government of the United States satisfy Spain and Don Jose Coppinger for the damages and injuries which they have sustained by the injustice of the American authorities in the Floridas.

No doubt but the President will acknowledge the justice of this remonstrance, and I flatter myself that he will be pleased to give, without delay, to a monarch who has given such proofs of his friendship for the United States, a satisfaction which his honor and that of the Spanish nation demand.

I repeat, &c.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

PHILADELPHIA, December 27, 1821.

SIR: The immense sacrifices made by Spain to satisfy the claims of the United States have given her a just right to flatter herself that the American Government would, in its turn, pay attention to those which His Catholic Majesty might see necessary to make, with that readiness which is due to a friendship that he had, at such great cost, endeavored to maintain between the two cabinets. Under this impression, I believed that the President, guided by his characteristic principles of justice, and with a full conviction of the solid reasons with which, in my notes of the 18th and 22d of last month, I demanded satisfaction for the injuries of General Jackson towards the Spanish commissaries and officers in the Floridas, would have been pleased to order it to be given to me without delay. But I see with pain that, so far from my hopes being realized, the receipt of my notes, after so long a time, has not even been acknowledged. What may have been the cause of this silence, I am not able to divine, unless it be the difficulty of deciding to what satisfaction His Catholic Majesty is entitled.

If my claims were founded on matters of interest, I could have waited for the answer to them without being troublesome to you, sir; but, as they originate in atrocious injuries committed against the honor of my King and my nation, I should be wanting to my most sacred duties if I did not persist in demanding the satisfaction which they require.

The more General Jackson's conduct is considered, the more evident it is that his sole aim by it has been to insult Spain. In fact, no advantage could result from it to the United States, no glory to the General himself, in trampling upon the defenceless commissaries and officers of Spain. And if none of these purposes (the only ones that could excuse him in the eyes of a cabinet less just than this) impelled him, what doubt can remain but that his sole motive was his inveterate hatred against the Spaniards? It is therefore certain that General Jackson ought not to meet protection from his Government, whose interest he did not consult, when he had the audacity to trample upon the law of nations, and the laws of every civilized people. But, admitting that his intention had been to promote the prosperity of his country, it would be doing a serious injustice to the President to suppose for a moment that he could approve of its being attained by measures so criminal. Satisfied of this truth, I have not the least doubt but that the satisfaction demanded will be given to me; and the sole purpose of this note is to request, sir, that you will be pleased to transmit it to me as soon as possible, as your own delicacy will convince you of the impatience with which His Catholic Majesty expects it, who, by how much more zealous he is to preserve the greatest harmony with the United States, by so much the more anxious will he be to see every cause tending to disturb it removed.

I embrace this opportunity to renew to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Mr. Adams to Mr. De Anduaga.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 31, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 14th, 18th, and 22d November, and 13th and 27th of the present month.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

In my letter to you of [2d] November last, in answer to that of the 6th of October, which had been received from Mr. Salmon, I informed you that a definitive answer upon the complaints of Mr. Salmon and Colonel Callava would be given after General Jackson should have been made acquainted with them, and his explanations of the motives and considerations by which he had been governed should be received.

In your letter of the 14th November you manifested your entire satisfaction with this course of proceeding; and when, afterwards, your letters of the 18th and 22d of November were received, containing new complaints against other proceedings of General Jackson, subsequent to those to which the letter of Mr. Salmon had applied, it was presumed that you would expect that the same course should be adopted with regard to these additional charges as had already met your approbation in relation to the preceding subjects of complaint. This was the reason why an immediate acknowledgment of the receipt of those letters was not transmitted to you, and is the motive for postponing at present any further reply to your letter of the 27th instant.

I had the honor of informing your predecessor, General Vives, that the statement, stipulated in the fourteenth article of the late treaty to be given by the United States, of the prizes made, and of injuries suffered by the privateers, consuls, and tribunals of France, in the ports of Spain, and its amount, could be ascertained only by the result of the commission instituted by virtue of the eleventh article of the treaty. That commission has already made some progress in the investigation of the cases brought before them; and when they shall have decided upon those concerning which the statement mentioned in the fourteenth article of the treaty is to be made, it shall be transmitted to you without delay.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DON J. DE ANDUAGA, Envoy, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, January 6, 1822.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 31st ultimo, in answer to mine of the 27th of the same month. When, in it, I deemed it my duty to repeat my demand of satisfaction for the conduct of General Jackson, I did so because I had no doubt that he, before leaving the Floridas, had informed his Government of his motives for maltreating the Spanish commissaries and officers. This persuasion was the stronger, inasmuch as I had before received letters from the Floridas considerably later than the events which gave rise to my complaints and the departure of General Jackson; but supposing his having given no account even of the reasons which impelled him to such extraordinary proceedings, (a very just impediment, for which the President may give time in order to determine on my demands,) some notice, it appears reasonable, ought to have arrived long since.

Yet, let the excuses of General Jackson be what they will, it is evident that he can give none for possessing himself of the papers belonging to His Catholic Majesty. I could have flattered myself, therefore, that the President would have been pleased to order the restoration of them, as he could not possibly have retained the least doubt in his mind about a provision so just.

In my note of the 22d of November I had the honor to communicate to you, sir, that I had ordered Colonel Coppinger to stay and return to St. Augustine to take charge of all the papers which had been taken from him. His remaining increases the damages which have been sustained by His Catholic Majesty, and adds to the vexations of which Colonel Coppinger himself has been the victim; and I shall also take upon me to add, that the delay in the restoration of documents belonging to a monarch friendly to the United States is not conformable to what His Catholic Majesty had a right to expect from a Government to which so many proofs of his delicacy and esteem have been given.

Wherefore, sir, I request of you, anew, that the most peremptory orders may be given for the immediate delivery to Colonel Coppinger of all the papers of which he was dispossessed, and I am persuaded that the President will not refuse so reasonable a demand; in the mean time, that, in giving complete satisfaction to Spain for the injuries committed against her, he may have that of wiping off the stain which General Jackson, with his unjust and violent proceedings, has thrown upon the reputation of the American authorities.

I renew, sir, the sentiments of my most distinguished consideration, &c.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to the House of Representatives copies of sundry papers having relation to transactions in East and West Florida, which have been received at the Department of State since my message to the two Houses of Congress of 28th of January last, together with copies of two letters from the Secretary of State upon the same subject.

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Worthington to the Secretary of State, dated EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, E. F.

St. Augustine, January 15, 1822.

The enclosed certificates (Nos. 12 and 13) will close all the papers which I have thought it necessary to send on respecting the archives.

If the Government will direct me what to do with the papers determined to be returned to the ex-governor and escribano, I will make the disposition accordingly.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

No. 12.

Colonel Forbes to Mr. Worthington.

ST. AUGUSTINE, January 8, 1822.

SIR: After the archives and documents had been investigated under your Excellency's commission of the 1st of October, and the papers separated, I communicated your orders to the escribano, Mr. Entralgo, to deliver him those taken from his office, which it was deemed the United States did not claim under the treaty; also, I made a similar offer to Mr. Arredondo, the general attorney of the ex-governor, Colonel Coppinger, he being absent, to deliver those taken from him, which it was thought proper not to retain. They both declined taking them; so they remain safe, but subject to future orders. I made the offer in writing, as one of the commissioners and as marshal of the United States for the Floridas, agreeably to your written directions. I am, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

His Exc'y W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,
Secretary and acting Governor East Florida.

No. 13.

Mr. Law to Mr. Worthington.

ST. AUGUSTINE, January 14, 1822.

SIR: Of the archives and documents taken into the American possession under your commission of the 1st of October, from the Spanish escribano, Mr. Entralgo, part of five boxes are retained as belonging to the United States under a fair construction of the treaty, and the remainder of the five boxes determined by the commissioners to be returned to Mr. Entralgo. From the Spanish ex-governor, Colonel Coppinger, part of six boxes are retained under the above construction, and the remainder of the six boxes determined, as above, to be returned to Colonel Coppinger. Both Colonel Coppinger and Mr. Entralgo, I learn, decline taking those offered to be returned. I would, therefore, advise some final disposition to be made of them, either by yourself or the General Government, as they may be subject to casualties while in our possession. To those papers retained, Americans, Spaniards, and all persons interested, have daily access. Those determined to be returned remain nailed up, and no one is suffered to handle or inspect them.

Yours, respectfully,

EDMUND LAW, *Alcalde.*W. G. D. WORTHINGTON, Secretary, &c.Captain Bell to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON CITY January 5, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor to command the detachment of the United States troops on the 10th of July, 1821, the day on which an exchange of flags took place at St. Augustine, the capital of East Florida, under the late treaty with Spain. On the day following I was, by commission from General Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, vested with all the powers of the late Spanish Governor Coppinger, which commission I received through the hands of the American commissioner, Colonel Butler, with other documents and instructions from my Government in the discharge of the duties of the provisional secretary of the province until the arrival of Mr. Worthington, who had been duly appointed by the President of the United States. Colonel Butler, the commissioner, shortly after set out for Pensacola. Among the documents left by him for my government and information, were extracts of the official correspondence between the two commissioners on the subject of the archives and documents relating to individual property, and the inhabitants of the province; by which it was agreed that they were not to be removed from St. Augustine, but to remain precisely as they were until the doubts arising on the part of the Spanish commissioner should, by reference to the Spanish authorities on his part, and to the American authorities at Washington on the part of the American commissioner, be settled. No inventory of the archives, documents, and papers, was ever made to my knowledge; none was delivered to me by Colonel Butler.

After his departure, a number of the inhabitants waited on me to know the situation in which the archives and documents relative to property and rights in the province had been left by the American commissioner, and if he had obtained possession of them. On being informed that they were said to be in the possession of the escribano, a Spanish notary and officer, until the doubts arising as to the delivery of them should be settled by the respective Spanish and American authorities, they appeared greatly dissatisfied, expressed themselves in a manner and in terms which led me to believe they had no confidence in the Spanish officers, and, finding no inventory had been made of the archives, declared, from their knowledge of the manner in which these documents were filed, that there was no security that the whole of the documents would ever be delivered; that important papers might be sent to the Havana, if not already sent; that others might be placed on the files; that the door was open to almost every species of fraud in the office, by which individual rights would be violated, and the public lands would be granted away without the possibility of detection. They strongly advised me, for the above reasons, to take possession of them. This, I informed them, I was not authorized to do, but things must remain as they were until I received further instructions. Boxes were already made in which these documents were to have been packed to be sent to the Havana, but they were in the public store, and under my charge. A Spanish armed schooner sailed, some time after the transports with the troops, for the Havana; as did also another vessel, which carried the treasurer of the province; it was said many boxes, supposed to contain documents, were taken by this officer. The whole of the archives or bureau of the city of Eugenia, which contained important documents relating to individual rights in the city, public squares, and vacant lands, were removed, or not found at the time of taking possession of the documents and papers found in the offices of the late Governor Coppinger and escribano. There was a vessel almost ready to sail for the Havana; boxes were ready in the Governor's house, in which the documents found in his office were to have been placed; this, I believe, he admits in his protest. Although the papers have been seized, a sufficient examination has been had to determine if all are there which were expected to be found. I frequently heard the persons appointed to examine them say that they did not find in the Governor's office those papers which are usually kept in this office. Whether any were removed after the 23d June, which were embraced in the correspondence, I am not able to say. I have no reason to believe there were, although the inhabitants interested were constantly complaining of the situation in which they were left, and were paying great fees to the office to obtain evidences of their papers being in the office. I must further state that the notary, Don Juan de Entralgo, had declined to take the oath of allegiance to our Government; that Governor Coppinger was respectfully applied to by me to deliver up the papers peaceably, before any resort was had to force; and when the papers were put into the hands of certain persons appointed to examine them, with directions to separate private papers from documents relating to the province, Governor Coppinger was given to understand that he, or any agent on his behalf, might attend the examination. As far as the examination has proceeded, many papers have been separated from the public documents, put into boxes, and reported to Mr. Worthington, for the purpose of being returned. By the citizens having property, and residing within the province, the conduct of the American officers in taking the papers was generally approved of.

Most respectfully, I am, &c.

JOHN R. BELL.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

General Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, January 22, 1822.

SIR: Your letter of the 1st instant reached me a few days since, in which you advise me of the receipt of mine of the 22d November, with its enclosures. I had also the honor to receive a copy of your communication, dated 2d November, to the Minister of Spain, together with the translations of two letters from said Minister, addressed to the Secretary of State, and transmitted to me by direction of the President of the United States. You inform me that the definitive answer to these letters will be deferred until you shall have the opportunity of obtaining my reply, with any remarks I may be disposed to make on the communications of the Minister of Spain.

I sincerely regret that Don Joaquin de Anduaga's letter of the 22d November had not been transmitted at an earlier period, as it will be necessary, in my reply, to refer you to two communications of Captain Bell, of the 31st July and 4th of August last, and to Mr. Worthington's letters on the subject of the archives at St. Augustine; the first of which is on file in the executive office at Pensacola, and the last I forwarded to you when I was informed by Dr. Bronaugh that my resignation was accepted on the 1st ultimo, not expecting to have any further use for them. Immediately on the receipt of your letter, however, I wrote to Mr. Worthington, requesting him to forward you certified copies of his communications as promptly as practicable, and have adopted the same measure in relation to those of Captain Bell, although I had been advised that he had transmitted duplicates to you from St. Augustine. To these documents I must refer you, relying upon my answers thereto, and my own recollection, for their contents, and accompanying my reply with such vouchers as are within my reach; believing there will be ample testimony in your possession to enable you to rebut the statements of this Minister of the Spanish Government.

Upon the subject of seizing the papers at St. Augustine, you observe that the Spanish Minister dwells with much earnestness on the agreement which had been made between Colonel Butler and the late Governor Coppinger concerning these papers, and requests to be informed whether this agreement was known to me at the time the order was issued for demanding and receiving them; and, if so, to state the particular grounds on which I judged it necessary to resort to compulsory measures for obtaining possession of them.

In answer to this inquiry, I have the honor respectfully to state that Colonel Butler, the commissioner appointed to receive the transfer of East Florida from the Spanish Government, reached me on the 8th of August last, at Pensacola, and made his report. As soon as it was submitted to my examination, I was entirely satisfied that neither Coppinger on the one hand, nor Butler on the other, had any authority, either under the treaty or their instructions, to enter into such an agreement relative to the archives which were, by a positive stipulation between the two Governments, have been delivered over, with the country, to the constituted authorities of the United States. The treaty was imperative, and vested the parties with no discretion on the subject. Believing, however, that the course adopted by Colonel Butler was perhaps the only one that could have been pursued, without the employment of force, to preserve the documents, and notwithstanding I was perfectly satisfied that Coppinger had, on his part, violated both the treaty and the order of the Captain General of Cuba, yet I felt disposed to leave the archives precisely in the same situation in which Colonel Butler had placed them under his agreement with Coppinger. I was induced to take this course, from a wish to create no unnecessary difficulties, and from a hope that the Spanish officers would comply with their arrangement, and permit the papers to remain unmolested until the arrival of the President's instructions in regard to their final disposition.

This Minister states that the commissioners, Butler and Coppinger, stipulated that the artillery and archives were to remain, the first in deposit, in possession of the Anglo-American commissary, and the last where they were, and without the possibility of their being taken away to the Havana. He does not say what was their situation, but it will be recollected that the alcalde was their keeper. Nor does he tell you that Don Jose Coppinger permitted them to be picked, and culled, and taken away, in violation of his solemn pledge and agreement, as you will see by a reference being had to Captain Bell's letters to me of the 31st July and 4th August, 1821, duplicates of which I am advised are in your possession.

When I received these letters from Captain Bell, who exercised provisionally the powers and authorities of Secretary of East Florida before the arrival of Mr. Worthington, I acknowledge that my indignation was very much aroused. I felt that it was my imperative duty to protect the people of Florida in the enjoyment of the rights secured to them expressly under the treaty. I was bound to act on the occasion. The agreement respecting the archives, although void ab initio, for the want of power, had been outrageously violated by Coppinger, or with his connivance; and the evidences of individual rights secured to the citizens were about to be fraudulently conveyed away, after he had pledged himself to Colonel Butler that they should not be removed from that place, and should remain precisely as they were.

The verbal report of Colonel Butler, as communicated in my letter of the 4th August last, affords a clue to the motives of Colonel Coppinger in attempting to practise this base deception. For the last six months previous to the transfer of the country, it is believed he had been engaged in issuing surreptitious grants for large quantities of land in East Florida. It became necessary that they should be taken to the Island of Cuba, for the purpose of consummating the titles. These were no doubt the documents which were picked and culled from the balance, to be transported to the Havana, as Coppinger was convinced that the fraud would be inevitably detected if they should be surrendered to the American authorities. This explains the reason why and wherefore they were not delivered over to our commissioner in the first instance, and forms the basis of the confidential communication made to Colonel Butler on the 3d of July last, advising him that a large portion of these archives, relating to private property, were packed up for removal to Cuba, and which gave rise to his letter to Colonel Coppinger of that date, as will appear by the enclosed extract, marked E.

Speaking of the correspondence between Colonels Butler and Coppinger, Don Joaquin de Anduaga remarks that, "by the before-mentioned correspondence, it appears that doubts had arisen whether the artillery and certain archives ought not, to be delivered over to the United States." With due deference, I would ask, could any doubts exist as to the archives, under the second article of the treaty? No. Could any doubts be entertained relative to the archives embraced in the instructions of His Catholic Majesty, or the instructions given by the Captain General of Cuba to Don Jose Coppinger, Colonel, and commanding the Spanish forces at St. Augustine, and who was charged with the delivery of the country, and all documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the country ceded? It is presumed not. In his letter to Colonel Forbes of the 16th May, 1821, the Captain General of Cuba says: "Respecting East Florida, where there ought to be found all her archives, Governor Mahy would direct that Governor, as instructed by him with the important commission, to make a formal delivery to Mr. Forbes of that province, as well as of the documents belonging to it." "A similar despatch would be addressed to the commandant of West Florida." Here is a positive declaration that such instructions were or should be given to Governor Coppinger for the delivery of all the archives included in the stipulation of the treaty. Contrast this statement of the Captain General of Cuba with the answer of Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler's letter to him, dated July 3, 1821: "Confining myself," he says, "to a compliance with the treaty and the orders of my Government," (which, he informed Colonel Butler verbally, prevented him from delivering the archives,) "their literal sense is the only guide to my endeavor in the execution; and when any doubts arise, I consult them with that frankness necessary to ascertain my course, and warrant my responsibility."

From this exposition, no one can fail to discover a striking contradiction between the Captain General (Mahy) and Governor Coppinger; the former assuring Colonel Forbes that he would direct Governor Coppinger to deliver over the documents to the American authorities, and the latter asserting that, "as an individual, he believed they should be given over;" (see E e.) but that the orders of his Government prevented him from performing that duty. We can find no excuse either for the Captain General, Governor Coppinger, or Colonel Callava, for not complying with the orders of their superiors, and with good faith carrying into effect the second article of the treaty, by delivering, and being prepared to deliver over all the archives and documents appertaining to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas. Instead of this, the Captain General does not deliver them at Cuba; Coppinger, contrary to his orders, was preparing to convey them away in a clandestine manner, in violation of his agreement and solemn pledges, until arrested in his faithless conduct by Colonel Butler; and Callava, whilst professing to surrender all the archives, &c., was wickedly and treacherously attempting to carry away the testamentary papers of the heirs of Vidal, and other documents, which were the evidences of claims to private property in the country ceded to the United States.

The unjustifiable delays and evasions of the officers of Spain in withholding the archives and documents, of which the delivery had been expressly stipulated by treaty—vouchers indispensable to the United States, for the dispensation of private justice and the establishment of private right, but entirely useless to Spain—could not but impress upon me the belief that they were intended to subserve the purposes of injustice, fraud, and oppression. The attempt to carry away a number of those documents from St. Augustine and Pensacola in a clandestine manner was considered as a flagrant violation of the treaty; and I began to entertain the opinion that a systematic combination had been formed amongst the officers of Spain to deprive the honest citizens of the country of all the evidences of their right to property secured to them by the provisions of the cession.

Under these impressions, and believing myself vested with legal authority to protect the rights of the citizens, I was urged, by the most imperative duty, to exercise it in their behalf. Upon the receipt of Captain Bell's letters, before referred to, advising me that the archives at St. Augustine were picked and culled, to be conveyed away, I forthwith wrote him, on the 1st of September, 1821, the letter herewith enclosed, marked C, of which the following is an extract:

"I have this moment received your several letters of the 31st July and 4th August, with their enclosures, and regret that the shortness of time will not permit me to answer in detail. On the subject of the archives, I will barely draw your attention to the second article of the treaty with Spain, according to which all archives or documents directly relating to the property or sovereignty of the country are to be delivered by her. You will, therefore, forthwith, on the receipt of this, if not already in possession of them, take them into your possession, and place them in the hands of the alcalde for safe-keeping, and who ought to be, like every other, a sworn officer under the Government, and not a Spanish officer owing no allegiance to the United States. All papers and documents in the possession of the cabildo, and, of course, in the possession of American and not Spanish functionaries, are to be retained, and none of them permitted to be culled and taken away." "I am gratified with the friendly expressions of the cabildo of St. Augustine, but am sorry to find they have so entirely mistaken the sense of the proclamation. Nothing could be more absurd than that Spanish officers, as such, should administer the Government. The true meaning is, that, whenever the incumbent will take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and abjure that of Spain, and take the oaths of office, he shall be continued therein. That part of the proclamation which enjoins fidelity to the Government of the United States would otherwise be nonsense; and the Government has, at all times, the power to remove or dismiss him, and supply his place; but this will not be done unless it be found that he is incompetent to his trust, or unfaithful; and, whenever either is the case, this power, for the benefit of the public, ought to be exercised."

Having previously addressed Captain Bell a letter on the 13th of August, 1821, a copy of which is enclosed, marked D, and forwarded it to him by Mr. Bird, attorney for the United States in East Florida, I was gratified to find, from his answer, that, before the receipt of either of my communications, himself and Mr. Worthington had taken the steps necessary to preserve the archives, and extend to the people of East Florida that protection which was secured and guaranteed to them under the treaty.

When it is recollected that the archives and documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas were to be transferred with the country, agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty, and that Governor Coppinger had been ordered to deliver those in East Florida, what indignation must fill every honest and honorable breast when we learn from the letter of the keeper of these papers at St. Augustine that he claims them as private property, which he had acquired by purchase? From whom could this purchase have been made? From the King? No; because he had stipulated to surrender them, with the country, to the American authorities. If bought at all, it must have been effected with the executive magistrate of the province. In either event, it must have originated in the grossest corruption, and was rendered null and void by the treaty between Spain and the United States.

Although Don Joaquin de Anduaga has taken occasion to heap upon me the most illiberal and indecorous epithets, he is challenged to substantiate a single instance in which myself, or those acting under me, have not scrupulously executed every article of the treaty with Spain.

It appears that the Minister of Spain considers his sovereign as having been insulted in the person of his commissary, Colonel Coppinger, at the time the seizure of the papers was effected; he insists that Colonel Coppinger was entitled to all the privileges and immunities of a public officer of Spain, in consequence of his being recognised as such in doing and transacting business with Captain Bell. The fact was, that Captain Bell was not vested with any diplomatic or commissarial powers, and any such recognition on his part was as ineffectual as it was without authority.

By turning to the act of cession executed by Colonel Butler and Jose Coppinger, it will be distinctly seen that neither of those persons retained any powers as commissioner after the date of that instrument. If this was the case, it must be equally evident that neither Captain Bell nor Mr. Worthington could have possessed such powers at the period to which the Spanish Minister has alluded. Colonel Jose Coppinger being the commander-in-chief, and Governor ex officio over East Florida, he was charged, under the treaty, with the delivery of the country and the withdrawal of the Spanish troops. The moment these duties were performed, both his and Colonel Butler's powers as commissioners ceased. This event took place on the 10th July, 1821, when the Spanish authorities ceased the exercise of their functions, as is demonstrated by the following extract from the act of cession:

"There has been verified, at four o'clock of the evening of this day, the complete and personal delivery of the fortifications, and all else of this aforesaid province, to the commissioners, officers, and troops of the United States, and, in consequence thereof, having embarked for the Havana, the military and civil officers and Spanish troops in the American transports provided for this purpose, the Spanish authorities having this moment ceased the exercise of their functions, and those appointed by the American Government having begun theirs," &c.

The surrender of the provinces had been completed, and the occasion which created commissioners ceased to exist. The authority and troops of Spain were withdrawn, and the United States put in entire and rightful possession of the country. The six months had also transpired within which the treaty provided the transfer of sovereignty should be made, as well as the evacuation of all the Spanish officers within the Floridas. Colonel Coppinger, remaining after the occurrence of these events, could no longer be considered as entitled to the privileges and immunities of a public agent; he could only be viewed as a stranger, permitted to reside in the Floridas, "amenable to the common judicial tribunals, but who, conformably to the Spanish laws existing before the cession of the province, would have been liable to removal from it, or to imprisonment, at the discretion of the Governor, for the mere act of being there."

These disclosures, I hope, will exempt me from the criminal charge which Don Joaquin de Anduaga has preferred against me, of having trampled upon the law of nations and the law of every civilized country. If the detection of treachery and prevention of fraud, the security of the rights of the citizen, and a scrupulous adherence to the articles of the treaty which both Governments were sacredly bound to fulfil, are to be considered atrocities, I have to observe that I glory in the charge, and give this further assurance—that it is the course which I shall always pursue. I would inquire of this Minister whether the law of nations protects the agents of Spain in the open violation of the treaty, the rights of individuals, and the orders of their Government? Does this law sanction the non-compliance with the most solemn engagements, by which the rights of individuals were to be sacrificed, by depriving them of those evidences of property stipulated to be delivered over with the country ceded? If so, then is every treaty a perfect mockery, and the law of nations becomes the authority for every species of fraud and corruption. Coppinger and Callava might not only have carried away all the archives of the country, but also the negroes, or moveable property, and their agency would have secured them from merited punishment.

To the remark of the Spanish Minister, "that the more my conduct is considered, the more evident it is that my sole object has been to insult Spain," I have to observe, in reply, that it is unjust. I challenge Don Joaquin de Anduaga to establish the fact necessary to authorize such a conclusion. If I know myself, I can declare, with the utmost confidence, that I have never entertained any thing like national antipathies, and that my conduct on no occasion has ever been influenced by such base and unmanly considerations. All the measures of my administration, whilst Governor of the Floridas, were founded upon the principles of justice, the object of which was to secure to the United States, and the people who were citizens of the ceded provinces, those rights which were guaranteed to them under the cession, and which the officers of Spain had wantonly violated, in contravention of the treaty, the positive orders of their superiors, and their own solemn pledges and engagements. The virtuous and honorable Spaniard claims the same share of my respect and confidence as the citizens belonging to any other nation. I rejoice in the regeneration of Old Spain, and in the independence of the American colonies, and hope that both may free themselves from that misrule and oppression with which they have been cursed for centuries past under former Governments.

The language used throughout the letters of the Minister of Spain, and the charges therein contained in relation to myself, cannot but be viewed as an insult to my Government, to the American people, and to the officer whom he has endeavored to cover with odium and disgrace. It is derogatory to that comity and decorum which should always characterize diplomatic communications, and which are essential to the harmony and friendly intercourse of nations. In reply, I confidently trust that the President of the United States will take such a stand as shall secure the respect due from foreign Ministers to his exalted station, to the officers of the Government, and to the nation over which he presides.

It is a subject of remark, that I have been the object of Spanish calumny and virulent animadversion ever since the transactions of the Seminole war. This spirit of hostility is to be discovered in the observation of Governor Mahy to Colonel Forbes; in the letter of the latter to the Secretary of State of the 20th May, 1821; in the protests of Colonels Coppinger and Callava; and has pervaded all the diplomatic communications of Spanish Ministers subsequent to the period to which I have alluded. Although such a course is insulting to myself, to the Executive, and to the American people, I have never deemed it of sufficient importance to induce me to complain.

Feeling a confidence in having always discharged my duty whilst in the service of my country, I disregarded the abuse and vituperation of Spanish agents, from a belief that my Government would vindicate its honor and dignity: this, I flatter myself, will yet be accomplished in due time. A considerable portion of my life has been devoted to the happiness, honor, and glory of my country; and when my conduct has met the approbation of the Government, I have a right to expect that it will resist any attempt to slander my reputation. Notwithstanding I solicit the most free and unrestrained investigation into all the measures of my public life by those to whom I am responsible, it is conceived that the same latitude should not be granted to the Ministers of foreign Powers: such an interference is rude and indecorous, and should be resented on all proper occasions. This, it is believed, is not due to me alone, but to the President and the nation.

I am, sir, with sentiments of great respect, &c.

General Jackson to Captain Bell.

PENSACOLA, September 1, 1821.

SIR: I have this moment received your several letters of the 31st July and 4th August, with their enclosures, and regret that the shortness of time will not permit me to answer in detail. On the subject of the archives, I will barely draw your attention to the second article of the treaty with Spain, according to which all archives and documents directly relating to the property or sovereignty of the country are to be delivered by her. You will, therefore, forthwith, on the receipt of this, if not already in possession of them, take them into your possession, and place them in the hands of the alcalde for safe-keeping, and who ought to be, like every other, a sworn officer under the Government, and not a Spanish officer owing no allegiance to the United States. All papers and documents in the possession of the cabildo, and, of course, in the possession of American and not Spanish functionaries, are to be retained, and none of them permitted to be culled and taken away.

I am gratified with the friendly expressions of the cabildo of St. Augustine, but am sorry to find they have so entirely mistaken the sense of the proclamation. Nothing could be more absurd than that Spanish officers, as such, should administer the Government. The true meaning is, that, whenever the incumbent will take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and abjure that of Spain, and take the oaths of office, he shall continue therein. That part of the proclamation which enjoins fidelity to the Government of the United States would otherwise be nonsense; and the Governor has, at all times, the power to remove or dismiss him, and supply his place; but this will not be done unless it be found that he is incompetent to his trust, or unfaithful; and, whenever either is the case, this power, for the benefit of the public, ought to be exercised.

I have read Mr. Fitch's report to you, and have discovered that he has viewed the constitution of Spain as in full force in the Floridas. This is not the fact. On the 4th May, 1814, it was annulled, and every act and decree passed in pursuance of it declared illegal and void. It was never re-established until 1820, after the Floridas had been ceded to the United States. Of course, Spain could not legislate for a country not her own. The first act after the re-establishment of the Cortes was to recommend the ratification of the treaty of cession; and no decrees of the Cortes were ever promulgated in the Floridas until after the ratification of the treaty. It would be strange, indeed, if Spain could legislate for a country whose sovereignty and property had passed out of her hands. The act of Congress for the occupation of the Floridas, and my proclamation, will, I think, clearly show that the Spanish constitution was not taken into view. They are precisely similar to those which preceded the occupation of Louisiana. Besides, the constitution merely provides for a form of government, of which the judiciary is a part, and a part which cannot be separated without being imperfect; and even this judiciary was never established in the Floridas by decree of the Cortes, not to speak of its entire incompatibility with the nature of our Constitution and Government. The mere circumstance of uniting in the same person the different offices of captain general, intendant, and provincial governor, and leaving it to the President to prescribe the manner in which the powers of the existing officers shall be exercised, shows that there was no intention to pursue the Spanish plan of government.

The ordinances heretofore sent you are intended to distribute and organize a government, approximating as nearly as practicable to that of Spain, and formed out of the powers with which the Spanish officers were clothed. It must be borne in mind that, although Spanish laws and usages are in force, excepting so far as they may be expressly altered, yet the Spanish Government has ceased.

Mr. Fitch's ideas as to the powers of the judge appointed by the President, so far as relates to the carrying into effect the acts extended over the Floridas, are correct; but the judge can exercise no other powers, unless specially given him by the instructions of the President. Such instructions have not been given, and I doubt very much whether the President could legally give them. There is no doubt that the person exercising the powers of the Governor of East Florida can exercise all the powers exercised under the King of Spain at the time the country was ceded. The Governors of the Floridas exercised judicial powers as late as the 10th July, 1820. This was up to the re-establishment of the Cortes, and the ratification of the treaty; and, to the very delivery of the country, admiralty jurisdiction.

On the subject of the archives, I have again to repeat that you will take them into your charge. Governor Coppinger's powers having ceased with the delivery of the country, he cannot be considered, as respects the United States, any more than any other individual. He is not recognised in any official capacity; he has, therefore, no right to demand any papers in the possession of the United States officers, or to hold any official correspondence on any subject arising since the delivery, by which act his official character, as to us, ceased; and even the subjects of difference which arose before the delivery were referred to the respective Governments.

Captain Willis is now here, on his way to St. Augustine; but, fearful of not being able to reach that place before the second Monday in this present month, he has therefore halted, to hear from you whether the clerk's office for the county of St. John is kept open for him. If it is, he will repair there as soon as advised of it at this place; and you will please to address him to the care of Cary Nicholas, postmaster, Pensacola.

On the subject of Indian agent, I have this day addressed a letter to the Secretary of War on that subject, enclosing Mr. Pennier's letter to him, and Mr. Dexter's.

Should you know where Mr. Pennier is, please to inform him that I have been waiting for him to report to me in person, and that I have a letter from the Treasury Department for him.

I am, with sentiments of respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of Florida, &c.

Captain JOHN R. BELL.

D.

Governor Jackson to Wm. G. Worthington, or Captain J. R. Bell, exercising the powers of the Governor of East Florida.

PENSACOLA, August 13, 1821.*

SIR: On the 28th ultimo I despatched an express, Captain Hanham, to you, with sundry ordinances that I found it necessary to adopt for the better organization of the Floridas; the ordinances are only a declaration of what the Spanish law really is, and what its operations under the Cortes would have been; the constitution of Spain providing for the trial, by jury, in criminal cases, although never extended to the colonies, because the treaty ceding the Floridas was concluded before the constitution was adopted and carried into execution in Spain.

When I took possession here, I found nothing but an alcalde, which was filled by a Spanish military officer, who could not, therefore, hold it under our Government. I appointed an alcalde, Judge Brackenridge, in whose custody all archives received were placed. Finding that a cabildo had once existed here, I ordained the re-establishment of it in that of a mayor and aldermen of the city, adding a board of health to it; and there being no judge, I created a county court, with the powers that this court would have held under the constitution of Spain, and that of the United States.

Colonel Butler reached me on the 8th instant, and reports that he found at St. Augustine an alcalde, a cabildo, and a judge, all in operation. This will afford you great relief in carrying into effect the ordinances sent you by Captain Hanham. In every instance where the incumbents in office will take the necessary oaths of office, and are, in your opinion, of good moral character, and fit for the office, you will continue them. I have found but few here of the Spanish inhabitants that would accept an office under our Government, not having determined of themselves whether they will become citizens of the United States; and believing that taking an oath of office would be considered their election to become citizens, they have, in most instances, refused.

It is necessary, on the change of government, that all officers who are to execute it under the United States should take the necessary oaths of office, and, when this is refused, you will fill the vacancies thus occasioned by new appointments, even when the old incumbents will remain, and especially in the latter case; for, as Spanish officers, they cannot execute the government under the United States.

This will be handed you by Mr. Bird, who has the appointment, by the President of the United States, as attorney for East Florida.

I am, with great respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extract of a letter from Governor Coppinger to Colonel R. Butler, under date

JUNE 23, 1821.

I answer your esteemed note of yesterday, assuring your Excellency, as I mentioned in my letter of the 19th, that, until I received the answer of my Government on the doubts arising on the delivery of the public archives relating to the individual property of the inhabitants of this province, and on which I have, on this date, written for information, they shall not be removed from this place, and shall remain precisely as they are. I shall likewise remain here until this point is decided, as well as that on the artillery, on which I have made my report; and, in the meantime, have formed an exact inventory of the documents contained in these archives.

Extract from Colonel Butler's letter to Jose Coppinger, Governor, &c., dated

The subject of the archives relating to individual property I consider perfectly understood between us, and will, therefore, remain silent on that head until you receive the further instructions of your Government in relation thereto.

Extract from Colonel Butler's letter to Governor Coppinger, which was predicated upon information, received confidentially, that a large portion of the archives relating to private property were packed up for removal to Cuba, dated

That a more perfect understanding should exist between us in relation to the archives which are embraced by the treaty of cession, and relating to individual property, is the object of this communication.

I should, upon mature reflection, consider myself wanting in my duty to the inhabitants of this province, who are about to become citizens of my Government, if I withheld any statement in relation to the archives, which might lead to the removal of any document that would be of importance to their security, and which my Government considers as included in the treaty. The following records are deemed indispensable to this object, viz: the royal or other orders, authorizing the Governor of this province to issue grants for lands, lots, or squares; the evidence of indemnity offered by Great Britain to her subjects, who might leave their property in this province and retire to her territory, after the cession of Spain; the proclamation of the Spanish authorities, calling on those individuals to come and dispose of their property, or peaceably occupy it within certain periods, or the same would be confiscated, and the order of confiscation thereafter; the original records of all grants made in the province, either by His Catholic Majesty, the Captain General of Cuba, or the Governors of this province, respectively; the original records relating to all trials and decisions embracing individual property; and the original records relating to the execution of wills and administration of estates.

The foregoing explanation is given to show you what I am bound to consider as the archives relating to individual property, and which are not to be removed from this place until the decision is had on the subject by our respective Governments.

The answer by Governor Coppinger.

The note your Excellency was pleased to send me yesterday, in order to point out which are the records comprehended in the treaty of cession, and appertaining to private property, I have duly examined, and have to answer that, confining myself to a compliance with the treaty and the orders of my Government, (which, he informed Colonel Butler verbally, prevented him from delivering the archives,) their literal sense is the only guide to my endeavor in the execution; and when any doubts arise, I consult them with that frankness necessary to ascertain my course, and warrant my responsibility.

Thus actuated, I early informed your Excellency of the measures which I had taken with respect to the public archives, or escribano office, or records bearing on private property of the inhabitants of this province—measures to which your Excellency was pleased to accede.

It now appears that your Excellency advances pretensions to other documents that, I am sorry to say, are, according to my conception, excluded from the delivery. I do not comprehend the ground upon which you found your demand; therefore, and in order to report to my Government, by the earliest opportunity, that it may decide with yours on these points, and, at the same time, on those others in question, your Excellency will excuse my not entering into particular observations on each of them.

Extract of Colonel Butler's answer, dated

JULY 5, 1821.

In answer to the note of yesterday, which your Excellency has done me the honor to address to me, I beg leave to remark, that the only ground assumed on my part, in making the communication of the 3d instant, was that of the faithful performance of my duty to my Government, and the individuals who are about to become citizens thereof; and I did not expect you to enter into particular observations on the subject of that letter, but I wished to give you timely information of what documents I considered to be the archives in our arrangement, and would be esteemed under the treaty sufficient to guaranty the possession of the inhabitants in their property, and that they might not be removed until the decision was had on the subject, when I could adopt such further amicable measures as are warranted by my instructions.

If I comprehend your Excellency aright, it is, that you will communicate a copy of that letter to the Captain General of Cuba.

Extract of Colonel Butler's letter to Captain J. R. Bell, dated

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 11, 1821.

The foregoing extracts are given you as the evidence of the actual situation of the archives relating to private property, and the decision of the Government of the United States must determine the necessary steps to be taken thereon.

The balance of the above letter relates to subjects unconnected with the archives.

ROBERT BUTLER.

E e.

Colonel Butler to General Jackson.

HERMITAGE, January 21, 1822.

SIR: On reading the correspondence between Colonel Forbes and the Captain General of Cuba, I find a promise, on the part of the latter, that the Governor of East Florida would be ordered to deliver over the archives to the American authorities; and this duty not having been performed, I consider it proper to advise you that, in the month of June last, Colonel Coppinger, late Governor of East Florida, stated to me, in a conference had on the subject of the delivery of the archives relating to individual property, that, as an individual, he believed they should be given over to the United States, but that his orders prevented him from turning them over. I mentioned to him that I had heard a report, as a reason for not turning them over, that it would be to the interest of the United States to destroy them; and remarked, that I regarded not the source from whence it came, as it could alone spring from the most wicked and unprincipled heart. As there appears an absence of good faith in the execution of the late treaty, I give you this information for the benefit of the Government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT BUTLER,

Late Commander in East Florida.

Mr. Worthington to General Jackson.

ST. AUGUSTINE, November 9, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your highly esteemed favor of the 1st ultimo; its delay may be accounted for from this remark on the envelope: "Missent to and forwarded from Washington City, October 24, 1821."

Your approbation of my humble but honest exertions to anticipate and fulfil your intentions in the organization of this Government, I receive with sentiments of no ordinary sensibility. I assure you I had difficulties to contend with, which, had they assailed me from a legitimate quarter, I should not have valued them "a pin's point;"

but, coming from a point of the horizon where I looked for only invigorating and cheering sunshine, it was peculiarly calculated to diminish and enervate my powers and official weight. I saw the whole ill policy with regret, but not dismay. I was determined the Spaniards should not see and triumph in the spectacle of the Americans quarrelling among themselves. Under the blessings of Heaven, I felt I could weather the storm, and I was conscious of your support. Your letter before me has shown I was not mistaken.

The affair of the Government-house is handsomely settled, as you will see by my correspondence, predicated on your opinion, with Colonel Eustis, marked Nos. 1, 2. To show you that I was uniform in my sentiments respecting the harmony which ought to exist between the civil and military authorities, (of your high encomium of which I am proud,) I enclose you two letters marked Nos. 3, 4. I would indeed give a mass of private evidences of this matter, but I take my leave of it, I hope forever, and sincerely pray your pardon for being so troublesome on such an affair.

I thank you for your advice on my probable intercourse with the Indians; I shall be governed by it literally. I intend, if practicable, to prepare a splendid talk for them; but they shall understand two things, at least, very distinctly: the non-natives must return amongst the Creeks; and the natives, if they stay in Florida, must be concentrated.

I sincerely hope, sir, that the visit of yourself and family to Tennessee will be as agreeable as it is no doubt judicious; and as for myself, I will endeavor to merit the additional proof of confidence which you have reposed in me during your temporary absence. Should you pay us a visit here, we will try to make the best fixture we can; but the yellow fever has sadly cut us up; even now it rages; God knows when it will stop; the first black frost, they say, is a certain bar to it; that may not come till January, if then. Yesterday, at my room, in the shade, the thermometer stood at 72; this is as cool as we have had it; at one P. M. I put it in the sun, and in ten minutes it rose to 105, so that I really do not know when we shall get rid of this plague.

I will now, sir, take leave to lay before you the remainder of the proceedings respecting our taking possession of the archives, &c.; they are marked No. 5. Any further course which you, or the Government at Washington, may direct concerning them, I will adopt; and in the interim, if any thing shall suggest itself to me as necessary to be done in the premises, I will progress in it.

The ex-governor, Coppinger, like his compeer Callava, I see, by a Charleston paper, publishes the proceedings as an "outrage." Nobody who knows the Spaniards, as the President, yourself, and many others of our countrymen, will pay much attention to those sorts of appeal. But, unfortunately for persons in public stations who get into disputes with them, too many of our fellow-citizens take sides with them because they know nothing about them. If it should be thought best, it is probable some of us who have been assailed may follow the example set at Pensacola, and publish a statement of the transaction.

As to myself, I intended to do what was right and proper, and hope my proceedings may meet your approbation. My fortune amongst the Spaniards, on both sides of the equator, has been to incur their dislike and hostility; yet, I trust, not of the good, liberal, and high-minded, on either side. Judge Duval and Mr. Hackley have not yet arrived.

With respect, &c.

Mr. Reynolds to General Jackson.

ST. AUGUSTINE, Nov. 13, 1821.

The other documents referred to by Governor Worthington cannot be forwarded by this mail, as much of our time must be necessarily devoted to the sick, the dying, and the dead. His Excellency residing in the island, about a mile and a half distant, prevents me from giving him this information previous to the departure of the mail. But being desirous that nothing which is in readiness should be delayed, I send you this letter to the commissioners, (No. 5,) upon their having closed the examination of archives and documents, &c., as far as was practicable under the circumstances.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WM. REYNOLDS,
Private Secretary.

His Exc'y ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

No. 5.

Governor Worthington to John R. Bell, James G. Forbes, and Edmund Law.

ST. AUGUSTINE, Nov. 7, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: I had the honor to receive your additional report of the 5th instant on yesterday evening, on the subject of the records and archives.

I felicitate you on the conclusion of the difficult and laborious duties which it was deemed necessary to assign to you, which you so cheerfully undertook, and so faithfully have discharged. I have been an eye-witness to the open and assiduous manner in which you conducted the investigation, and have no doubt, when the voluminous mass which you have transmitted shall be criticised, it will prove to be an honest and able examination.

Without detracting from the other commissioners, I must be permitted to pay a particular compliment to the President, who, during the whole tedious inquiry, while the epidemic raged in this city, with the most assiduous punctuality, presided at the board. I know the various duties of Colonel Forbes and the sickness of Mr. Law prevented them giving such full attendance as they otherwise would have done. I am perfectly satisfied with them and the whole board. You will be pleased to present my respects to the secretaries, Messrs.

Betham, Guy, Lynch, and Reynolds, for the faithful discharge of their duties.

And now, gentlemen, I must be permitted to say, notwithstanding the clamor which has been raised on a similar proceeding respecting the archives at Pensacola, and even against the affair here, you have conducted and finished this commission in a manner to challenge the approbation of every disinterested and honest American in our country, and, I hope, even of every unprejudiced Spaniard, who possesses one spark of true Castilian honor and sincerity. With great respect, &c.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,

Secretary and Acting Governor of E. F.

JOHN R. BELL, JAMES G. FORBES, and EDMUND LAW, Esqs.

Extract of a letter from General Andrew Jackson to the Secretary of State.

HERMITAGE, NEAR NASHVILLE.

January 31, 1822.

Enclosed I send you an extract of a letter from Colonel George Walton, Secretary of West Florida, and charged with exercising the powers of Governor of the same, in my absence, with its enclosure. Having received from the President of the United States his letter bearing date the 31st December last, post-marked at the City of Washington, the 9th instant, notifying me that my resignation was accepted, forecloses me from giving to Colonel Walton any instructions officially, and I have thought proper to refer him to the President for directions as to the proper course to be pursued with regard to those Spanish officers. Colonel Coulon is father-in-law to John Innerarity. Guillemard is a very base and treacherous man, being the same who piloted the British up Bayou Bienvenue in the year 1815, then an officer of Spain, when the attempt was made upon New Orleans by General Pakenham.

I also enclose herewith, marked No. 2, for the information of the President of the United States, the certificate of Mr. Henry Wilson, a man of respectability, that goes to show the fraudulent practices committed by the officers of Spain, with regard to land titles in the Floridas, and forcibly adds to the propriety of adopting the rule I have heretofore recommended, of appointing none to the office of commissioners for the adjudication of land titles in Florida but those of honesty, integrity, and entirely disinterested. Should this rule not be adopted, great frauds will be imposed upon the United States.

Extract of a letter from Colonel George Walton, Secretary of West Florida, and exercising the duties of Governor of the same, to General Jackson, dated

JANUARY 7, 1822.

A few days ago, two of the Spanish officers, Colonel Marcos de Villiers, generally called Colonel Coulon, and Arnaldo Guillemard, arrived here in a vessel from Havana. It was first intimated to me that they had resigned their commissions in the Spanish service; but when arrested by my order, and brought before me, they declared they had come with the intention of asking permission to attend in person to the settlement of their private affairs, and the removal of their families. They solemnly declared that they had not returned in defiance of the proclamation, which they had promptly obeyed, and that they are ready to submit themselves to any order which should be taken in their case. For the present, I ordered them into confinement; but the calaboose being in no condition to receive them, (for, excepting the officers' room, it has no fire place,) and as Coulon is a very old man, and his wife at this time extremely ill, I thought it best to confine them in their own houses. The situation of old Coulon was such that it would have been cruel to confine him in the dungeon with the common malefactors; and I could not, with propriety, make a distinction with respect to Guillemard. They then presented the enclosed memorial, in which they throw themselves on the mercy of the Government.

After these concessions, and the humble manner in which they sue to be permitted to remain, I was well convinced that you would have granted them the indulgence they prayed for. But, under my instructions, although a state of things was presented, by the returning sense of propriety on the part of these people, different from what is contemplated in these instructions, yet I did not consider myself authorized to go any farther than to continue them in the same confinement under further orders. I was well convinced that while, on the one hand, you were determined to cause the Government provisionally established over these provinces to be respected by every one living under it—and, as far as you were concerned, to cause the stipulations of the treaty to be enforced—yet I also knew, from the magnanimity of your disposition, that you would instantly relent on the first manifestation of respect to the Government, and submission to its determinations. This course, however, was not adopted by me until after consultation with Colonels Fenwick and Clinch, Major Denkins, and Judge Brackenridge, who all concurred in the opinion that this was, under all circumstances, the most proper.

The sixty days in the case of Innerarity having expired, application was made for execution, as nothing had been offered by him in the mean time on any claims put in by creditors. He had got the papers on his receipt, as had been customary, and, when called upon, I found he was disposed to try his old tricks; on which I had a notice served upon him to show cause at eleven o'clock this day why an attachment should not issue. I had determined to commit him instantly if the papers were not then produced, and to keep him in prison until they should be forthcoming. He took the hint, and left them with Mr. Cannon last night. A long memorial by Mr. Acre was presented, praying a review of the whole proceedings; but I shall pay no attention to it, and will now proceed forthwith to compel the payment of the money.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

I learn from St. Augustine that the splendid talk alluded to in my last, has entirely failed, from the unaccountable and singular circumstance of there being no Indians to listen to it, as none attended on the occasion, although a considerable concourse of whites, who had assembled on the beautiful plains of Atlathua, waited impatiently several days for their arrival.

Colonel Walton to Colonel Clinch.

PENSACOLA, January 21, 1822.

SIR: I have to request that you will direct that such portion of the troops under your command as may be necessary shall be furnished, to carry into effect the proclamation issued by General Jackson in September last, requiring the departure of certain Spanish officers from the Floridas—two of the officers named in that proclamation having returned to this city without permission.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
GEORGE WALTON,

Sec'y of West Florida, Acting Governor.

Colonel D. L. CLINCH,
Commanding the post of Pensacola.

To Captain WILSON, the Officer of the day:

You are hereby commanded, forthwith, to apprehend and bring before me, at the Executive chambers, Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, that they may be dealt with according to law, for the contempt and disobedience of a certain proclamation issued by his Excellency General Andrew Jackson on the 29th day of September, 1821, requiring the said Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard to withdraw themselves from the Floridas.

Given under my hand and private seal, (there being no seal of office,) this 2d day of January, 1822, at Pensacola, in the province of West Florida.

GEORGE WALTON,

Sec'y of West Florida, Acting Governor.

By the Acting Governor:

SAMUEL FRY, Private Secretary.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS, PENSACOLA,
January 2, 1822.

Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard having this day been brought before George Walton, Esq., Secretary of West Florida, and Acting Governor of the same, by virtue of his warrant, that they might be dealt with according to law for the contempt and disobedience of a certain proclamation issued by his Excellency Major General Andrew Jackson on the 29th day of September, 1821, requiring the said Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard to withdraw themselves from the Floridas, and having been required to show cause why they should not be committed to prison for the said contempt, were heard by counsel; and his Excellency the Acting Governor, not being fully advised as to the matter offered by them in excuse of their return to this province, granted further time to the said Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, until to-morrow at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to show further cause, &c.; and, in the mean time, they were ordered to consider themselves under arrest, and confined to their own houses by parole of honor.

To His Excellency George Walton, Governor of the Floridas, &c. The memorial of Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard respectfully represents:

That your memorialists, with other Spanish officers, were, by the proclamation of his Excellency Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, issued on the 29th of September last, ordered to quit the Floridas within three days thereafter, for reasons therein assigned. That your memorialists, in obedience to the said proclamation, withdrew from the said provinces, and repaired to the island of Cuba; and that, after being there some time, they found themselves compelled, from the situation of their private affairs, and the illness of a part of their families, to return to this country. That, in so doing, nothing was further from their intention than any disrespect to the constituted authorities of this province, whose determinations they declare themselves ready to observe and obey so long as they remain in the same. But they beg leave respectfully to represent that, at the same time, they are Spanish officers; they and their families have also been inhabitants of this country for many years; and that they are owners of real and personal property here to a considerable amount. That, by the fifth article of the treaty, the inhabitants of the ceded provinces who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject in either case to duties. That your memorialists are desirous to remove with their families to the Spanish dominions; and that, unless permitted to remain here and superintend in person these necessary arrangements, they will be exposed to serious loss and injury.

Your memorialists therefore pray that, taking the circumstances into consideration, and especially their solemn declaration that they return not as Spanish officers, but as private individuals, on private business, and with every disposition to obey and respect the existing authorities, they may be permitted to remain for the purpose of settling their affairs, and making the necessary arrangements for the removal of their families.

MARCOS DE VILLIERS, ARNALDO GUILLEMARD.

JANUARY 3, 1822.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS, PENSACOLA,
January 5, 1822.

I have maturely considered the memorial of Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard. Although well satisfied, from the known magnanimity of General Jackson, that, if he were present, the petition would be granted, yet, from the circumstances in which I am placed, I consider myself compelled to continue the present arrest and confinement till further orders.

No. 2.

H. Wilson's certificate.

PENSACOLA, January 6, 1822.

I do hereby certify that, some time last Spring, I made a purchase of Henry Michelet of this place, of a tract of eight hundred arpents of land on the Escambia, according to the plat of survey accompanying the grant; and on a view of which plat, the grant was confirmed by the Intendant General of Havana. About two months ago, having taken an American surveyor to examine the lines, it was found that the Spanish survey was a mere fiction, it being absolutely impossible, from the nature of the ground, and the course of the river, to obtain a tract of eight hundred arpents in any way agreeing with the description in the plat. When this was made known to Mr. Michelet, and he was convinced of the fraud, he proposed to me to make a survey of any vacant lands I should choose; that he could have the plat of this land withdrawn from the title-papers, and send the new survey to Havana, and have it certified by the surveyor general, and inserted in the place of the first. This proposal I rejected with indignation, as dishonorable to me as an individual, and a fraud upon my Government.

HENRY WILSON.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Walton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 22, 1822.

SIR: The President of the United States having received and accepted the resignation of General Jackson as Governor of the Floridas, I am instructed to inform you of his direction that you should continue to exercise all the authorities vested in you by General Jackson during his absence from the province, until further provision for the government of the same shall be made by Congress, or until you shall receive further orders from the President.

I have received from General Jackson a letter, enclosing an extract of yours to him of the 7th of January last, relating to the case of the two Spanish officers, Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, under arrest at their houses for returning to Pensacola in disobedience to the proclamation of General Jackson.

As it appears by their memorial that they returned for the settlement of their private affairs and the care of their families, and that they pledge themselves to pay due respect to the laws and to the constituted authorities of the Territory, the President directs me to instruct you to discharge them from arrest, and permit them to remain there.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir,
your very humble and obedient servant,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

GEORGE WALTON, Esq.,

Secretary, &c., of West Florida.

The Secretary of State to Don Joaquin de Anduaga.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 15, 1822.

SIR: In the letters which I had the honor of writing you on the 2d of November and 31st of December last, you were informed that a definitive answer to the complaints against certain proceedings of General Andrew Jackson, while Governor of Florida, which were contained in a letter to this Department from Don Hilario de Rivas y Salmon, before your arrival in this country, and in your letters of the 18th and 22d of November, would be given after the substance of those complaints should have been made known to General Jackson, and his explanations of the motives and considerations by which he had been governed, in adopting the measures complained of, should have been received.

In performing this promise, I am commanded by the President of the United States to repeat the assurance of his deep regret that the transactions which formed the subject of these complaints should ever have occurred, and his full conviction, upon a review of all the circumstances which have attended them, that they are attributable entirely to the conduct of the Governor and Captain General of Cuba, and of the subordinate officers of Spain, in evading and refusing the fulfilment of the most express and positive stipulations of the treaty, both of evacuating the province within six months from the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, and of delivering the archives and documents relating directly to the property and sovereignty of the provinces.

At the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, your predecessor, General Vives, delivered an order from His Catholic Majesty to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas, informing him of the cession to the United States of that part of the provinces of which he was the Governor, that was situated on this continent, and instructing him as follows:

"I command you, and ordain, that after the information which shall be seasonably given to you by my Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary at Washington of the ratifications having been exchanged, you proceed, on your part, to make the proper dispositions, in order that, at the end of six months, counting from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, the Spanish officers and troops may evacuate the territories of both Floridas, and that possession of them be given to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them. You shall arrange in proper time the delivery of the islands adjacent and dependent upon the two Floridas, and the public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property; as also the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the same two provinces, by placing them at the disposal of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them."

This order, thus clear and explicit, was despatched, together with letters from General Vives, to the Governor of Cuba and the Floridas, notifying him of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, by Colonel James G. Forbes, who was commissioned "as agent and commissary of the United States, to deliver to him the royal order, to arrange and concert with him, conformably to instructions committed therewith, the execution of the above stipulations, and to receive from the said Governor, and from any and every person possessed of the said archives and documents, all and every one of the same, and to dispose thereof in the manner prescribed by his instructions." Colonel Forbes's authority, thus, was to receive the documents and archives, and to concert and arrange with the Governor of the Floridas the delivery of those provinces, which General Jackson was commissioned to receive, take possession of, and occupy, and of which he was further commissioned to be the Governor when surrendered to the United States.

The royal order was delivered by Colonel Forbes to the Governor of the Floridas, at the Havana, on the 23d of April, 1821. There has been shown by that Governor no cause or reason which could justly have required him to delay the delivery of the documents and archives, and the arrangements for the delivery of the provinces, beyond the term of a single week. There were twenty boxes of those archives and documents—the whole, or with very few exceptions—the whole of which ought, by the positive stipulations of the treaty, and by the express order of the King of Spain, to have been immediately delivered to Colonel Forbes. Not one of them was delivered to him, nor has one of them been delivered to this day.

The orders for the surrender of the provinces were delayed from day to day, notwithstanding the urgent and continual solicitations of Colonel Forbes, for the term of six weeks; at the end of which, to avoid further indefinite procrastination, he was compelled to depart without receiving the archives and documents, but with repeated promises of the Governor that they should be transmitted to this Government—promises which have remained to this day unperformed.

The orders for the delivery of the provinces themselves were not only thus unreasonably withheld, but, when made out, though not furnished to Colonel Forbes until the last week in May, were made to bear date on the 5th of that month. Nor were they prepared conformably to the stipulation of the treaty, or to the royal order of His Catholic Majesty; for, instead of directing the surrender to be made to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them, the instruction to the commanders in East and West Florida was to deliver those respective provinces to Colonel Forbes himself, who had from the United States no authority to receive them. And although expressly advised of this fact by Colonel Forbes, with the request that the orders of delivery might be amended, and made conformable to the treaty and to the royal command, Governor Mahy did not so amend it, but reduced Colonel Forbes to the alternative of submitting to further delays, or of departing with an imperfect and ambiguous order of delivery of West Florida, authorizing its surrender to the legally constituted authorities of the United States (that is, as Governor Mahy well knew, to General Andrew Jackson) only in case of any accident happening to Colonel Forbes, whom he still affected to consider, notwithstanding his own express declaration to the contrary, as the commissioned agent of the United States to that effect.

The twenty boxes of documents and archives which were at the Havana, as has been mentioned, had been transmitted thither from Pensacola, and contained all the most important records of property in West Florida. The possession of them was in the highest degree important to the United States, not only as the vouchers of individual property, but as protecting guards against the imposture of fraudulent grants.

The same persevering system of withholding documents which it was their duty to deliver has marked, I am deeply concerned to say, the conduct of both the commanders of East and West Florida, who were charged, respectively, to deliver those provinces to the United States. It is to this cause, and to this alone, as appears from a review of all the transactions of which you have complained, that must be traced the origin of all those severe measures which General Jackson himself was the first, while deeming them indispensable to the discharge of his own official duties, to lament. Charged as he was with the trust of receiving the provinces in behalf of the United States, of maintaining their rights of property within them, of guarding them to the utmost of his power from those frauds to which there was too much reason to apprehend they would be liable, and to which the retention of the documents gave so great and dangerous scope—intrusted, from the necessity of the case, during the interval of time while the general laws of the United States remained unextended to the provinces, with the various powers which had until that time been exercised by the Spanish Governors, and which included the administration of justice between individuals—it was impossible that he should not feel the necessity of exercising, under circumstances thus exasperating and untoward, every authority committed to him by the supreme authority of his country, to preserve inviolate, so far as on him depended, the interests of that country, and the sacred obligations of individual right.

In the proceedings connected with the delivery of the province, he had as little reason to be satisfied with the conduct of Colonel Callava as with that of the Captain General. On a plea of indisposition, that officer had, on the day of the surrender, evaded the performance of a solemn promise, which General Jackson had considered an indispensable preliminary to the act; and afterwards the Colonel positively declined its fulfilment. He had, however, completed the surrender of the province with which he had been charged. He had declined producing to General Jackson any credential as a commissioner for performing that act, but had informed him that he should make the surrender as the commanding officer of the province, by virtue of orders from his superior. This service had been consummated; and Colonel Callava, whom General Jackson had formerly notified that he had closed with him his official correspondence forever, was bound, by the special stipulation of the treaty, to have evacuated, as one of the Spanish officers, the province before the 22d of August. If General Jackson had, in courtesy to Colonel Callava, considered him, notwithstanding his own disclaimer of the character, as a commissioner for the delivery of the province, there can be no pretence that he was entitled to special privileges under it, after he had avowedly performed all its duties; after he had been informed by General Jackson that their official correspondence was finally closed; and after the date when, by the positive engagements of the treaty which he was to execute, he was bound to have departed from the province. From the time when his functions for the surrender of the province were discharged, he could remain in Pensacola no otherwise than as a private unprivileged individual, amenable to the duly constituted American authorities of the place, and subject to the same control of General Jackson as a private citizen of the United States would have been that of the Governor of the Floridas before the surrender had taken place.

That this was the opinion of Colonel Callava himself, and of his friends who applied to Judge Fromentin for the writ of habeas corpus to rescue him from the arrest under which he was placed by the order of General Jackson, is apparent from their conduct on that occasion. It is stated by Judge Fromentin that, before granting the supposed writ of habeas corpus, he required that Colonel Callava should enter into a recognizance for twenty thousand dollars, with two securities, each for the amount of ten thousand dollars: the condition of which recognizance was, that Colonel Callava should personally be and appear before the Judge of the United States for West Florida, &c., whenever required so to do; that he should not depart from the city of Pensacola without the leave of the said court, nor send away, remove, or otherwise dispose of, unknown to the said court, any of the papers in question. It was only upon the promise of his friends that this recognizance should be executed, that Judge Fromentin consented to issue the writ of habeas corpus; and this recognizance renounces, in fact, every pretension of exemption from the judicial authority of the country, and, consequently, of the diplomatic privileges of a commissioner.

It has been seen that the most important documents relating to the property of West Florida had been transmitted to the Havana; there remained, however, a portion of them, particularly of judicial records, relating to the titles of individual property. Some of these Colonel Callava did deliver up with the province; others, of the same description and character, indispensable for the administration of justice in the province, and useless at the Havana, whither it was his intention to have transported them, were retained—not in his possession, but in that of Don Domingo Sousa, a Spanish officer, who, by the stipulation of the treaty, ought also to have departed from the province before the 22d of August.

The day immediately preceding that date, the alcalde of Pensacola, at the suit of a woman in an humble walk indeed of life, but whose rights were, in the eye of General Jackson, equally entitled to his protection with those of the highest rank or the most commanding opulence, had represented to him that a number of documents belonging to the alcalde's office, and relating to estates at that place, and to suits there instituted, were in the possession of Domingo Sousa; that the necessity for obtaining possession of those documents was urgent, and, therefore, he requested the Governor to authorize some one to make a regular demand for them, and to ascertain what they were, Governor Jackson, accordingly, forthwith commissioned the Secretary of the Territory, the alcalde of Pensacola himself, and the clerk of the county court of Escambia, to proceed to the dwelling of Sousa to make demand of all such papers or documents belonging to the alcalde's office as might be in his possession; and, in case of Sousa's refusal to exhibit or deliver the same, immediately to report the fact to him (the Governor) in writing. These commissioners the next day reported to the Governor that they had examined the papers in the possession of Sousa; that they had found among them four sets of papers of the kind which belonged to the office of the alcalde, and among them those in which the woman from whom the first application had proceeded was interested; that they had, both verbally and in writing, demanded of him the delivery of those documents, which no private individual had a right to keep, as they related to the rights of persons holding or claiming property in the province, but that Sousa had refused to deliver them, alleging that he was but the servant of Colonel Callava, and could not deliver them without his order. In the transactions of Sousa, on this occasion, is manifested the same consciousness that the claim of diplomatic privilege, set up by Colonel Callava to screen him from the operation of the authority of Governor Jackson, was without foundation; for, although he refused to deliver up the papers conformably to the Governor's command, he submitted to the examination of them by the commissioners, in obedience to the same authority; and, though he declined receiving from them the letter demanding the delivery of the papers, he told them that, to relieve himself from the responsibility of keeping them, he should deliver them to Governor Callava himself. They were accordingly sent to the house of Colonel Callava, and put into the possession of his steward, Fullarat.

It is clear, however, that, if the papers while in Sousa's possession were privileged from being delivered up at the command of Governor Jackson, they were equally privileged from examination by the same authority; and, if they were not lawfully screened from his process in the custody of Sousa, they could not be made so by removing them to the house of Colonel Callava. The truth is, that the removal of the documents at that time, and in such a manner, was a high and aggravated contempt of the lawful authority of the Governor. It not only claimed for Colonel Callava diplomatic immunities, but assumed that he was still the Governor of the province, and that Sousa was amenable for his conduct only to him. Colonel Callava might, on the same pretence, have retained the whole body of the Spanish officers and troops under his command at Pensacola, and insisted upon exercising over them all his extinguished authority as Governor and Commander-in-chief after the 21st of August, as he could to exercise any official authority within the province over Domingo Sousa, or to extricate him from the lawful jurisdiction of Governor Jackson.

It is under these circumstances that the subsequent measures of Governor Jackson are to be considered. He immediately issued an authority to Colonel Robert Butler and Colonel John Miller to seize the body of Sousa, together with the papers, and to bring them before him, that Sousa might answer such interrogatories as might be put to him, and comply with such order and decree touching the said documents and records as the rights of the individuals, secured to them by the treaty, might require, and the justice of the case might demand. By virtue of this order, Sousa was brought before Governor Jackson, and again recognised the authority under which he was taken, by answering the interrogatories put to him. But he had already put the papers and documents out of his possession; and thus, as far as was in his power, baffled the ends of justice, and set at defiance the lawful authority of the Governor.

In this transaction, Colonel Callava was avowedly the principal agent; and, altogether unjustifiable as it was, whatever consequences of inconvenience to himself resulted from it, must be imputed to him. It was an undisguised effort to prostrate the authority of the United States in the province; nor had Governor Jackson any other alternative to choose than tamely to see the sovereign power of his country, intrusted to him, trampled under foot, and exposed to derision by a foreigner, remaining there only upon his sufferance; or, by the vigorous exercise of his authority, to vindicate at once the rights of the United States, and the just claims of individuals to their protection.

Governor Jackson could consider Colonel Callava in no other light than that of a private individual, entitled, indeed, as the officer of a foreign Power, to courtesy, but not to exemption from the process of the law. Notwithstanding his improper conduct, Governor Jackson, in the first instance, authorized Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh, accompanied by Mr. Brackenridge, the alcalde, to wait upon him and his steward, and demand from them the specified papers, which Sousa had declared, in his answer to the interrogatories, to have been delivered to the steward at Governor Callava's house. It was only in case of the refusal to give up the papers that the order extended to the seizure of the person of Colonel Callava, that he might be made to appear before Governor Jackson, to answer interrogatories, and to abide by and perform such order and decree as the justice of the case might demand. This demand was accordingly made; and although at the first moment peremptorily refused, yet, upon Colonel Callava's being informed that his refusal would be considered as setting at defiance the authority of the Governor of the Floridas, and of the consequences to himself which must ensue upon his persisting therein, he desired to be furnished with a memorandum, setting forth the documents required; which was accordingly done. But when the delivery of the papers was again demanded of him, he repeated the refusal to deliver them, and attempted both to avoid the personal approach of Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh, and to exhibit a resistance by force of arms to the execution of the Governor's order. And it is not a little remarkable that, among the persons who appeared thus arrayed against the authority of the United States, to accomplish the denial and removal of the papers, was a man against whom the most important of those papers were judicial decisions of Governor Callava himself, in behalf of the orphan children, for the establishment of whose rights they were indispensably necessary, and at whose application they had been required.

Standing thus, in open defiance to the operation of the law, Colonel Callava was taken before the Governor; and there refusing to answer the interrogatories put to him, and asserting the groundless pretension of answering only as a commissioner, and by a protest against the acts of the Governor, he was, by his order, committed to prison until the documents should be delivered to the alcalde. On the next day, a search warrant for the papers was issued by the Governor, upon which they were actually obtained, and directed to be delivered to the alcalde; whereupon, Colonel Callava was immediately released.

In all these proceedings you will perceive, sir, that not one act of rigor, or even of discourtesy towards Colonel Callava, was authorized by Governor Jackson, which was not indispensably necessitated for the maintenance of his authority, and the discharge of his official duty, by the unjustifiable and obstinate resistance of Colonel Callava himself.

On a review of the whole transactions, I am instructed by the President of the United States to say that he considers the documents in question as among those which, by the stipulation of the treaty, ought to have been delivered up, with the province, to the authorities of the United States; that they were, on the 22d of August, when in the possession of Domingo Sousa, within the jujurisdiction of the United States, and subject to the control of their Governor, acting in his judicial capacity, and liable to be compulsively produced by his order; that the removal of them from the possession of Sousa, after the Governor's order to him to deliver them had been served upon him, could not withdraw them from the jurisdiction of Governor Jackson, and was a high and aggravated outrage upon his lawful authority; that the imprisonment of Colonel Callava was a necessary (though by the President deeply regretted) consequence of his obstinate perseverance in refusing to deliver the papers, and of his unfounded claim of diplomatic immunities, and irregular exercise even of the authorities of a Governor of Florida, after the authority of Spain in the province had been publicly and solemnly surrendered to the United States.

That the documents were of the description of those which the treaty had stipulated should be delivered up with the province, is obvious from the consideration of their character. They related to the property of lands in the province. They were judicial records, directly affecting the rights of persons remaining in the province—rights which could not be secured without them—rights over which the appellate tribunal of the Governor of Cuba, to which Colonel Callava proposed to remove the papers, henceforth could have no authority or control, they having become definitively subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The only reason assigned by Colonel Callava for the pretension to retain them is, that they related to the estate of a deceased Spanish officer, and had thereby been of the resort of the military tribunal. But it was for the rights of the living, and not for the privileges of the dead, that the documents were to operate. The tribunal of the Captain General of Cuba could neither need the production of the papers, nor exercise any authority over the subject-matter to which they related. To have transferred to the island of Cuba a question of litigated property, concerning land in Florida, between persons all of whom were living, and to remain in Florida, would have been worse than a mockery of justice. Indeed, Mr. Salmon, in his note, appears to have been aware of the weakness of this allegation; declines the discussion of the question; and, in justification of the refusal of Colonel Callava to deliver up the documents, merely rests its defence upon the plea that the papers had not been demanded of him officially. It has been seen that Colonel Callava had no official character which could then exempt him from the compulsive process of the Governor. But Mr. Salmon alleges that the Spanish constitution, as well as that of the United States, separates the judicial from the Executive power exercised by the Governor or Captain General of a province.

Neither the Constitution, nor the laws of the United States, excepting those relating to the revenue and its collection, and to the slave trade, had at that time been extended to Florida; and as little had the Spanish constitution been introduced there, in point of fact, however it might have been proclaimed. But, be this as it may, the case, in relation to which the documents required in the case of Vidal had been drawn up, and were needed, was one of those which, under the Spanish constitution itself, remained within the jurisdiction of the Governor. This is declared by Colonel Callava himself on the third observation of the appendix to his protest, transmitted with the letter of Mr. Salmon. It is the reason assigned by him for having withheld those documents from the alcalde. And one of them was a judgment rendered by Colonel Callava himself, after the time when the proclamation of the Spanish constitution in the province is alleged to have been made. The cause, therefore, was, on every hypothesis, within the jurisdiction of the Governor; the papers were indispensable for the administration of justice in the cause; and when once applied for by a person entitled to the benefit of them, it was the duty, the inexorable duty, of Governor Jackson to put forth all the authority vested in him necessary to obtain them.

Nor less imperative was his obligation to punish, without respect of persons, that contempt of his jurisdiction which was manifested in the double attempt of Colonel Callava to defy his power and to evade the operation of its process.

With regard to the proclamation of General Jackson of the 29th of September, commanding several Spanish officers, who, in violation of the stipulation in the treaty, had remained at Pensacola after the expiration of the six months from the day of the ratification of the treaty, to withdraw within four days from the Floridas, which forms the subject of complaint in your letter of the 18th of November, it might be sufficient to say that it did no more than enjoin upon those officers to do that which they ought before, and without any injunction, to have done. The engagement of the treaty was, that they should all have evacuated the province before the 22d of August.

If they remain there after that time, it could only be as private individuals, amenable in every particular to the laws. Even this was merely an indulgence which it was within the competency of General Jackson at any time to have withdrawn. From the extract of a letter from him, of which I have the honor of enclosing a copy, it will be seen that he was far from being disposed to withdraw it, had they not, by their abuse of it, and by open outrages upon his authority, forfeited all claims to its continuance.

This extract furnishes a satisfactory answer to your question why, if the fulfilment of the article was the object of the proclamation, it was confined to the eight officers by name, and not extended to all other Spanish officers in the Floridas? It was because the deportment of the others was as became them—decent, respectful, and friendly towards the Government under the protection of which they were permitted to abide. In the newspaper publication which gave rise to the proclamation of General Jackson, the Spanish officers avowedly acted, not as private individuals, but as a distinct body of men, speaking of Colonel Callava as their chief, their superior, and arrogating to themselves, as a sort of merit, the condescension of knowing what was due to a Government (meaning the American Government) which was on the most friendly footing with their own. This is language which would scarcely be proper for the ambassador of one nation upon the territory of another, to which he would owe not even a temporary allegiance. From persons situated as those Spanish officers were, it was language of insubordination and contempt.

In alluding to the fact that officers of the American squadron in the Mediterranean are sometimes received with friendly treatment on the territories of Spain, to make a case parallel with the present, it would be necessary to show that some superior officer of the said squadron should, while enjoying the hospitality of the Spanish nation upon their shores, first attempt to evade and to resist the operation of process from the constituted judicial tribunals of the country, and then pretend, as an American officer, to be wholly independent of them; and that some of his subalterns should not only countenance and support him in these attempts, but should affect to consider him, while on Spanish ground, as their only superior and chief, and, by unfounded and inflammatory publications in the daily journals, to rouse the people of Spain to revolt and insurrection against the judicial tribunal of their own country.

If the bare statement of such a case would be sufficient to raise the indignation of every honorable Spaniard, let it be observed that even this would be without some of the aggravations of the conduct of these Spanish officers at Pensacola; for such outrage would be far less dangerous committed against old established authorities, which might rely upon the support of the whole people surrounding them, than in the presence of a people whose allegiance had been but just transferred to a new Government, and when the revolt to which they were stimulated would seem little more than obedience to the authorities to which they had always been accustomed to submit.

The very power which the Spanish Governor and officers had exercised before the surrender of the province ought to have been a most urgent warning to them to avoid every semblance of authority in themselves, or of resistance to that of the United States, after the transfer of the province had been completed.

In forbearing particularly to reply to that part of your note in which you think yourself authorized to pronounce the charge of General Jackson against these Spanish officers, of having attempted to excite discontent in the inhabitants, false, I shall barely express the hope that the term was admitted into your communication inadvertently. The conduct of the officers at the time of Colonel Callava's conflict with the authority of the Governors, as well as in their insulting newspaper publication, was of a character and tendency too strongly marked to leave a doubt of the truth with which it is described in General Jackson's proclamation; and in passing unnoticed this and other mere invectives against an officer whose services to this nation have entitled him to their highest regard, and whose whole career has been signalized by the purest intentions and the most elevated purposes, I wish to be understood as abstaining from observations which, however justified by the occasion, could but add to the unpleasantness of a discussion already sufficiently painful.

That this conduct on the part of the Spanish officers was highly reprehensible, cannot reasonably be denied; and had General Jackson been disposed to animadvert upon it with severity, his course would undoubtedly have been that which you have pointed out as appropriate to the offence. They would have been cited before the proper tribunal, heard upon specific charges, allowed time and liberty to make their defence, and punished by commitment to prison. General Jackson preferred a milder and more indulgent measure; and, without prosecuting them as criminals, only withdrew from them the privilege of a protracted infraction of the treaty, by requiring them forthwith to depart from the province. To justify him in this requisition, neither arrest nor judicial trial was necessary or proper. The facts were of public notoriety, and could not be denied. The proclamation only required of them the execution of the treaty by the removal of their persons. Had their conduct even been unexceptionable, this measure would have been within the undoubted authority of General Jackson. As their deportment had been, it was the most lenient exercise of his power practicable to vindicate the insulted honor and justice of his country.

I pass to the consideration of the complaints contained in your letter of the 22d of November. In order to take a correct view of this subject, it is again necessary to advert to the royal order of His Catholic Majesty to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas, commanding him to cause to be placed at the disposal of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them the archives and documents relating directly to the property and sovereignty of the two provinces.

On the 16th of May, the Captain General and Governor wrote to Colonel Forbes that, "respecting East Florida, where there ought to be found all her archives, he (Governor Mahy) would direct Governor Coppinger to make a formal delivery of that province, as well as of the documents belonging to it."

On the 24th of May, Colonel Forbes wrote to the Captain General, reminding him of the repeated promises made by his Excellency to despatch him with the archives which were to be delivered, and then were at the Havana, and with the orders for the delivery of the provinces and of the archives deliverable there; of the continual disappointments to which he had been subjected by the failure of the performance of those promises, and of the necessities which urged his immediate departure. He therefore proposed "that, if any further researches should be necessary for the discovery of the said archives, they might be delivered, when more convenient, to the Spanish Government; that he (Colonel Forbes) should be allowed to proceed immediately to West Florida with the commissary appointed to carry the final order to the sub-governor there; and, lastly, that a duplicate order be given at once, as agreed upon, to the Governor of East Florida, for the delivery of that province to the constituted authorities of the United States, together with the archives which were declared to be on the spot."

On the 29th of May, the Captain General answered this letter, and enclosed to him the orders to the several Governors of East and West Florida for the delivery of the provinces, (antedated, as I have already mentioned,) with a declaration that the archives then at the Havana, and which ought to have been delivered to Colonel Forbes, should be transmitted to the Government of the United States as soon as they were selected—a promise, as I have before observed, yet unfulfilled.

These orders of the Captain General to the commanders of East and West Florida are further remarkable by the omission of any direction in them for the delivery of the archives and documents. It had been expressly agreed by him with Colonel Forbes that the order for the delivery of East Florida should include that of the archives; but it was not sufficient for Governor Mahy to avoid the performance of this promise.

By the letter from Colonel Butler to General Jackson, of the 21st of January last, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose, it appears that, with regard to the greatest and most important part of those documents, he had expressly instructed Colonel Coppinger not to deliver them; and hence, when, on the 18th of June, Colonel Butler, the officer of the United States authorized to receive the province, notified Colonel Coppinger that he had designated Major Cross to receive the archives relating to the sovereignty and individual property of the province, he was answered by Colonel Coppinger: "As respects the delivery of the public archives containing the records of individual property of this province, that will be delayed until various doubts that occur are cleared up; but they will not be removed until then; nor will I leave this place until all matters are regulated and concluded between us that demand my personal assistance."

Thus, upon the pretence of doubts, the nature of which was not explained, Colonel Coppinger declined, positively, to deliver up documents conformably to the express stipulation of the treaty. Colonel Butler immediately proposed to him a conference on the subject, which was held on the 21st of June. At that conference Colonel Coppinger told Colonel Butler that, "as an individual, he believed these archives should be given over to the United States, but that his orders prevented him from turning them over." Colonel Butler therefore assented (as, indeed, no other alternative seemed to be left him) that Colonel Coppinger should have time to write to the Captain General of Cuba for the decision of his doubts; and mentioned to him the opportunity of a vessel then about to sail for the Havana, whence she was to return to St. Augustine, and might bring the answer of the Captain General. Colonel Coppinger, on the 23d of June, informed Colonel Butler that he had that day written to the Captain General for the solution of his doubts, and, until he received his answer, the archives should not be removed from St. Augustine, and should remain precisely as they were. Colonel Butler, by his letter of 26th June, agreed to remain silent on the head of the archives until the answer should be received from the Captain General; but within one week from that time Colonel Butler received information that a large portion of these documents were packed for transportation. He wrote therefore, on the 3d of July, to Colonel Coppinger, enumerating specifically several kinds of records relating directly to the property of the province, and declaring that he considered them among those which were not to be removed: the reply to which, by Colonel Coppinger, is especially to be remarked, as expressing his opinion that several of those documents were excluded from delivery. There can be no reasonable doubt that all the papers specified by Colonel Butler's letter were of those which the treaty had stipulated should be delivered up. When, therefore, General Jackson considered and compared together the express and positive order of the King of Spain to the Captain General and Governor of Cuba that he should faithfully see to the delivery of the documents; the pretences on which he evaded the delivery to Colonel Forbes of those which were at the Havana, within his own control; the promise that he would direct the delivery by Colonel Coppinger of those that were at St. Augustine; the peremptory postponement of Colonel Coppinger to deliver up any documents or records relating to individual property; his engagement that none of them should be removed until he should receive further instructions from the Captain General, and, within one week after, his attempt to pack up for transportation to Cuba a large portion of them; and, finally, his pretensions that many papers, manifestly having direct relation to the property of the province, were excluded from delivery, and his recurrence to the literal sense of his orders from the Captain General, with the verbal avowal to Colonel Butler of his own opinion that the documents ought to be delivered, though he was forbidden by his instructions to deliver them; it was impossible for General Jackson to close his eyes against proceedings so unjustifiable and improper. He, therefore, gave instructions to the officer commanding at St. Augustine to take possession of the papers which the treaty had stipulated should be delivered.

The necessity for taking possession of them had, indeed, arisen before the instructions of General Jackson were received. Most of the records relating to individual property had been left in possession of Don Juan de Entralgo, who, on the pretence that he had purchased at public sales, under the Spanish Government, not only those documents, but the office of register of them, openly advanced the claim of retaining the records as his private property, and of continuing the exercise of the office, and receiving fees for granting copies of the same.

Spain—Delivery of the Floridas.

These pretensions were raised on the 5th of September, nearly three months after the doubts of Colonel Coppinger had, with the consent of Colonel Butler, been referred to the Captain General and Governor of Cuba. Long before that time the answer of that officer ought to have been received, peremptorily commanding the delivery of the papers.

It was impossible that the United States should acquiesce in the claims of Mr. Entralgo. They were unquestionably entitled to the documents; and whatever injury he might sustain by the delivery of them, it might give him a fair demand of indemnity from his own Government, but certainly not from the United States.

Yet the Secretary and Acting Governor, Mr. Worthington, allowed a further delay of nearly a month before taking the decisive measure necessary to obtain the documents. He then, on the 3d of October, authorized three persons of respectable character to obtain them, with the use of force if necessary, but with all suitable delicacy and respect towards the persons who had been the officers of Spain in the province. I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, copies of the orders from the Secretary (Worthington) to the commissioners appointed by him to receive, and afterwards to examine and assort the papers, and of their reports to him, exhibiting the manner in which both those services were performed. They will prove that every regard was shown towards Colonel Coppinger and Mr. Entralgo compatible with the execution of the duty; and, after the assortment of the papers, all those which were not of the description stipulated to be delivered over by the treaty have ever been, and yet are, ready to be returned to Colonel Coppinger, or to any person duly authorized to receive them.

Such is the view which I am instructed to say has definitively been taken by the President of the United States in relation to the transactions which formed the subjects of your letters of the 18th and 22d of November last, and of that of Mr. Salmon of the 6th of October. He is satisfied that, by the proceedings of the Governor of Florida towards Colonel Callava on the 23d of August last, and towards certain individuals presuming to act as a body of Spanish officers in Florida, in contempt of the authority of the United State, on the 29th of September, and by those of the Secretary of East Florida, acting as Governor on the 2d and 3d of October, towards Colonel Coppinger and Don Juan de Entralgo, no intention of injury or insult to His Catholic Majesty or his Government was entertained, and that no just cause of complaint by them was given. That those measures were all rendered necessary by the total disregard of the Captain General and Governor of Cuba and the Floridas, and of his subordinate officers in the Floridas, not only of the solemn stipulation in the treaty for the delivery of the archives and documents directly relating to the property of those provinces, but of the royal order of their sovereign commanding the said Captain General to see to the faithful execution of that engagement—an engagement, in the fulfilment of which the rights not only of the United States, but of every individual inhabitant of the provinces and proprietor in them, were deeply and vitally interested.

The mere enumeration of the documents, as specified in the demands of them made by the officers of the United States, before resort was had to any measure of rigor for extorting them, proves that they were indispensable for the establishment of public right, or for the security of private property. To Spain, not one of these documents could, after the transfer of the provinces, be of the slightest interest or utility. To the United States they were all-important. If the Governor and Secretary had so little understood their duty to the public rights of their country committed to their charge as to have suffered the removal of records essential to guard the interests of the nation against the insatiate greediness and fraudulent devices of land speculators, they had yet a sacred duty to perform to the people of the country, by retaining the common vouchers of their estates. What individual would have been secure in the tenure of his land, in the evidences of his debts, or in the very shelter over his head, if Colonel Callava could have carried to Cuba his own judgments in favor of the Vidals, because their father, when alive, had been an Auditor of War? and if Don Juan de Entralgo could have transported to the same island all the title-deeds of East Florida, because he had bought his office of recorder at public auction?

The delays of the Captain General of Cuba, with regard to the fulfilment of the royal order transmitted to him by Colonel Forbes, were so extraordinary, and, upon any just principle, so unaccountable that the Minister of the United States in Spain was, by letters from this department of the 13th and 16th June last, instructed, upon his return to Madrid, to represent the same to your Government, and to request new and peremptory orders to that officer for the delivery of the archives in his possession, conformably to the stipulation of the treaty. The renewal of the order was declined, upon the ground of entire confidence on the part of your Government that the Captain General would, before it could be received, have completed the delivery of the archives and documents, as he had been commanded by the King.

I regret to be obliged to state that this just expectation of His Catholic Majesty has not yet been fulfilled.

Captain James Biddle, commander of the United States frigate Macedonian, has therefore been commissioned to repair to the Havana, there to receive the documents and archives which Colonel Forbes was obliged to leave, and which it is hoped the Captain General and Governor of Cuba will cause to be delivered without further delay.

I pray you, sir, to receive the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

DON J. DE ANDUAGA,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

Great Britain—Treaty of Peace.Don Joaquín de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, April 24, 1822.

SIR: As soon as the news was received in Madrid of the recent occurrences in New Spain, after the arrival at Vera Cruz of the Captain General and supreme political chief appointed for those provinces, Don Juan O'Donoju, and some papers were seen relative to those same transactions, it was feared that, for forming the treaty concluded in Cordova, on the 24th of August last, between the said General and the traitor Colonel Don Augustin Iturbide, it had been falsely supposed that the former had power from His Catholic Majesty for that act; and in a little time the correctness of those suspicions was found, as, among other things, the said O'Donoju, when, on the 26th of the same August, he sent this treaty to the Governor of Vera Cruz, notifying him of its prompt and punctual observance, told him that, at his sailing from the Peninsula, preparation for the independence of Mexico was already thought of, and that its bases were approved of by the Government, and by a commission of the Cortes. His Majesty, on sight of this, and of the fatal impression which so great an imposture had produced in some ultra-marine provinces, and what must, without difficulty, be the consequence among the rest, thought proper to order that, by means of a circular to all the chiefs and the corporations beyond seas, this atrocious falsehood should be disbelieved; and now he has deigned to command me to make known to the Government of the United States that it is false, as far as General O'Donoju published beyond his instructions, by pointing out to it that he never could have been furnished with other instructions than those conformable to the constitutional principles.

In compliance with this order of His Majesty, I can do no less than observe to you, sir, how unfounded one of the reasons is in your note of the 6th instant for the recognition by this Government of those of the insurgent provinces of Spanish America—that it was founded on the treaty made by O'Donoju with Iturbide; since, not having had that power or instruction to conclude it, it is clearly null and of no value.

I repeat to you, sir, &c.

Don Joaquín de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, April 26, 1822.

SIR: I have received your note of the 15th instant, in which you are pleased to communicate to me the reasons which induce the President not only to refuse to His Catholic Majesty the satisfaction which I demanded, in his royal name, for the insults offered by General Jackson to the Spanish commissaries and officers, but to approve fully of the said chief's conduct.

Before answering the contents of the said note, I thought it my duty to request instructions from my Government; and, therefore, without delay, I have laid it before them. Until they arrive, therefore, I have confined myself to two observations: 1st. If, in my note of November last, I said that, as General Jackson had not specified the actions which had induced him to declare the Spanish officers expelled from the Floridas criminal, or given proof of them, I thought myself authorized to declare the accusation false, I did not this through inadvertency, but upon the evident principle that every person accused has a right to declare an accusation destitute of proof false, and much more an accusation not pretended to be proved. This assertion of mine does not presume that I am not persuaded of the merit of the said General, and of the claim which he has upon the gratitude of his country; but, although it is believed the duty of his country to eulogize and reward his eminent services, yet it will be lawful for the representative of a Power outraged by him to complain of his conduct. I cannot persuade myself that, to aggravate my said expression, you could have thought that I had been wanting in due respect; it not being possible for that opinion to have entered your mind, when, by his orders, Mr. Forsyth had sent to the Spanish Minister, on the 1st of September last, a note, in which, complaining of the Captain General of the Island of Cuba, he accuses him of dishonorable pecuniary motives in not having delivered the archives, without giving any proof of so injurious an assertion; and I must remark that the rank of General Mahy in Spain is at least as elevated as that of General Jackson in the United States, and that the services performed by him to his country have rendered him as worthy as he of its consideration and respect.

2d. Although you are pleased to tell me that part of the papers taken from Colonel Coppinger are ready to be delivered, which the American Commissioners, after having examined them, have adjudged to be returned to Spain, I do not think myself authorized to admit their return in this manner, but in the mode which I demanded in my note of the 22d of November last.

As I have seen by the public papers that the President has communicated to Congress the note which you were pleased to address to me, dated the 15th instant, and that it has been ordered to be printed, I take the liberty of requesting that you will have the goodness to use your influence that this my answer may be treated in the same manner, that Congress and the public may be informed that, if I have not answered the first part of it, as respects the general business, it is only to wait for the instructions of my Government; but that I have answered what was personal.

I renew to you, sir, &c.

GREAT BRITAIN—TREATY OF PEACE.

[Transmitted to the House, Feb. 21, 1822.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents accompanying it, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of the 17th January last.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21, 1822.

Great Britain—Treaty of Peace.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Feb. 21, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th January, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before the House all the correspondence which led to the Treaty of Ghent, together with the protocol, which has not been made public, and which, in his opinion, it may not be improper to disclose, has the honor to submit to the President the papers embraced by that resolution.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT of the U. S.

[The documents communicated with the preceding Message are inserted in Appendix to volume third, (the third session) of the 13th Congress, with the exception of the following, which should follow page 1379:]

Extract of a letter from Jonathan Russell, Esq., to the Secretary of State, dated

GHEENT, December 25, 1814.

My necessary occupation, at this moment, in aiding my colleagues to prepare our joint despatches, puts it out of my power to furnish you with any details or observations exclusively my own.

As, however, you will perceive, by our despatch to you of this date, that a majority only of the mission was in favor of offering to the British Plenipotentiaries an article confirming the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and ours to the liberty as to the fisheries, it becomes me, in candor, to acknowledge that I was in the minority on that question. I must reserve to myself the power of communicating to you, hereafter, the reasons, which influenced me to differ from a majority of my colleagues on that occasion; and if they be insufficient to support my opinion, I persuade myself they will, at least, vindicate my motives.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

SIR: The treaty which we signed yesterday with the British Ministers is, in my opinion, as favorable as could be expected, under existing circumstances, so far as they were known to us. The attitude taken by the State of Massachusetts, and the appearances in some of the neighboring States, had a most unfavorable effect. Of the probable result of the Congress at Vienna we had no correct information. The views of all the European Powers were precisely known, from day to day, to the British Ministry. From neither of them did we, in any shape, receive any intimation of their intentions, of the general prospect of Europe, or of the interest they took in our contest with Great Britain. I have some reason to believe that all of them were desirous that it might continue. They did not intend to assist us; they appeared indifferent about our difficulties; but they rejoiced at any thing which might occupy, and eventually weaken, our enemy. The manner in which the campaign has terminated; the evidence afforded, by its events, of our ability to resist, alone, the now very formidable military power of England; and our having been able, without any foreign assistance, and after she had made such an effort, to obtain peace on equal terms, will raise our character and consequence in Europe. This, joined with the naval victories, and the belief that we alone can fight the English on their element, will make us to be courted as much as we have been neglected by foreign Governments. As to the people of Europe, public opinion was already most decidedly in our favor. I anticipate a settlement with Spain on our own terms, and the immediate chastisement of the Algerines. Permit me to suggest the propriety of despatching a squadron for that purpose, without losing a single moment.

I have little to add to our public despatch on the subject of the terms of the treaty. I really think that there is nothing but nominal in the Indian article, as adopted. With respect to precedent, you will find two, though neither is altogether in point, viz: the — article of the Treaty of Utrecht, and the latter part of the — article of our treaty with Spain. You know that there was no alternative between breaking off the negotiations and accepting the article; and that we accepted it only as provisional, and subject to your approbation or rejection.

The exception of Moose island from the general restoration of territory is the only point on which it is possible that we might have obtained an alteration, if we had adhered to our opposition to it. The British Government had long fluctuated on the question of peace; a favorable account from Vienna, the report of some success in the Gulf of Mexico, or any other incident, might produce a change in their disposition; they had already, after the question had been referred to them, declared that they could not consent to a relinquishment of that point. We thought it too hazardous to risk the peace on the question of the temporary possession of that small island, since the question of title was fully reserved; and it was, therefore, no cession of territory.

On the subject of the fisheries within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, we have certainly done all that could be done. If, according to the construction of the treaty of 1783, which we assumed, the right was not abrogated by the war, it remains entire, since we most explicitly refused to renounce it, either directly or indirectly. In that case, it is only an unsettled subject of difference between the two countries. If the right must be considered as abrogated by the war, we cannot regain it without an equivalent. We had none to give but the recognition of their right to navigate the Mississippi, and we offered it. On this last supposition, this right is also lost to them; and, in a general point of view, we have certainly lost nothing. But we have done all that was practicable in support of the right to those fisheries; first, by the ground we assumed, respecting the construction of the treaty of 1783; secondly, by the offer to recognise the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi; thirdly, by refusing to accept from Great Britain both her implied renunciation of the right of that navigation and the convenient boundary of 49 degrees, for the whole extent of our and her territories west of the Lake of the Woods, rather than to make an implied renunciation, on our part, to the right of America to those particular fisheries.

I believe that Great Britain is very desirous of obtaining the northern part of Maine, say from about 47 degrees north latitude to the northern extremity of that district, as claimed by us. They hope that the river which empties into the Bay des Chaleurs, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, has its source so far west as to intervene between the head-waters of the river St. John and those of the streams emptying into the river St. Lawrence; so that the line north from the source of the river St. Croix will first strike the heights of land which divide the waters emptying into the Atlantic ocean (river St. John) from those emptying into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, (river des Chaleurs,) and afterwards the heights of land which divide the waters emptying into the Gulf of St. Lawrence (river des Chaleurs) from those emptying into the river St. Lawrence; but that the said line never can, in the words of the treaty, strike any spot of land actually dividing the waters emptying into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence. Such will be the foundation of their disputing our claim to the northern part of that territory; but, feeling that it is not very solid, I am apt to think that they will be disposed to offer the whole of Passamaquoddy bay and the disputed fisheries as an equivalent for the portion of northern territory which they want, in order to connect New Brunswick and Quebec. This may account for their tenacity with respect to the temporary possession of Moose island, and for their refusing to accept the recognition of their right to the navigation of the Mississippi, provided they recognise ours to the fisheries.

That northern territory is of no importance to us, and belongs to the United States, and not to Massachusetts, which has not the shadow of a claim to any land north of 45 degrees to the eastward of the Penobscot river, as you may easily convince yourself of, by recurring to her charters.

I have the honor to be, with respect, &c.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE SPANISH PROVINCES OF SOUTH AMERICA.

[Documents accompanying the Message of the President, communicated to Congress, March 8, and April 26, 1822. The Message of March 8 will be found in the text, ante p. 1238.]

The Secretary of State to Mr. John M. Forbes.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 5, 1820.

SIR: The certificate from this Department, which has been made out and transmitted to you, constitutes you agent for commerce and seamen for either of the provinces of Buenos Ayres or of Chili, in whichever of them Mr. J. B. Prevost shall not be. He is at this time at Buenos Ayres; but having, at one period, intimated to the President a preference to return to Chili, where he some time resided, it is thought due to him to leave the selection of his residence, after your arrival at Buenos Ayres, to himself. Should he determine to continue there, you will proceed, either by land over the Andes, or in the frigate Constellation round Cape Horn, to Valparaiso, and take up your residence there, or at St. Jago de Chili, which is understood to be the seat of the revolutionary Government of that province. If he should prefer to return thither, you will remain at Buenos Ayres.

The commercial intercourse between the United States and those countries, though not very considerable, is deserving of particular attention. Whatever accurate information you can obtain relating to it, as well as to the commerce of those countries with other nations, and to their internal trade, will be particularly acceptable. The condition of our seamen there will also deserve your notice. The performance of these duties will involve also the political relations between those countries and the United States. In the progress of their revolution, Buenos Ayres and Chili have, to the extent of their powers, and, indeed, far beyond their natural means, combined maritime operations with those of their war by land. Having no ships or seamen of their own, they have countenanced and encouraged foreigners to enter their service, without always considering how far it might affect either the rights or the duties of the nations to which those foreigners belonged. The privateers which, with the commissions and under the flag of Buenos Ayres, have committed so many and such atrocious acts of piracy, were all either fitted out, manned, and officered by foreigners, at Buenos Ayres, or even in foreign countries, not excepting our own, to which blank commissions, both for the ships and officers, have been sent. In the instructions to the late Commodore Perry, (which his lamented decease prevented from being executed by him, and a copy of which is now furnished to you,) certain articles in the Buenos Ayrean privateering ordinance were pointed out, particularly liable to the production of these abuses, and which, being contrary to the established usages among civilized nations, it was hoped would have been revoked, or made to disappear from their otherwise unexceptionable code. These instructions were renewed to Commodore Morris; but the time of his stay at Buenos Ayres was so short, and he was there at a moment of so great a change in the ruling power of the State, that, although he communicated to the then existing Director the substance of the representations which Commodore Perry had been instructed to make, we know not that it was attended with any favorable result. You will consider the parts of Commodore Perry's instructions which may be still applicable on your arrival in South America as directed to yourself, and, should you proceed to Chili, will execute them there, no communication upon the subject having yet been made there. Among the inconveniences consequent upon this system of carrying on maritime warfare by means of foreigners, has been occasionally, and to a considerable extent, the enticement of seamen belonging to merchant vessels in the ports of Buenos Ayres and Chili from their engagements, to enlist them in privateers or public armed vessels of those countries. In attending to the numerous trials and convictions for piracy which have recently afflicted our country, and cast an unusual gloom over our annals, you will remark that a great proportion of the guilty persons have been seamen thus engaged, foreigners at Buenos Ayres, or enlisted in our own ports, in violation of our laws. Whether at Buenos Ayres or in Chili, you will use every exertion in your power, consistent with the respect and conciliatory deportment to be constantly observed towards the existing public authorities, to protect the seamen of the United States from all such enlistments, and the owners and masters of the merchant vessels from time to time arriving there from the loss of their men by such means.

The Commercial Digest of the Laws of Foreign Countries with which the United States are in relation, a copy of which has been furnished you, may suggest to you the nature of part of the information which is desirable from South America.

Political information will be equally acceptable. The more particular and correct the information of this nature which you can obtain, the more acceptable it will prove. Besides the struggle in South America for independence, against which Spain is the only opposite party, internal feuds and civil wars have peculiarly marked every step of the revolutions in progress upon that theatre. As an agent and citizen of the United States, the first advice I shall give you is, to observe and report, with all the vigilance and discernment, and penetration and fidelity to your own country, that you possess, the movements of all parties, but to make yourself a partisan to none. From the documents lately received here, it is apparent that a negotiation has been some time on foot between the late Governments of Buenos Ayres and France. It is well known that a negotiation of much longer standing has existed between the same Government and Portugal; nor has Mr. Rivadavia been residing two or three years to no purpose in England. To ascertain the real movements of all these parties, a neutral position, a neutral heart, and an observing mind, are indispensable. In recommending it to your attention, I would add the caution, neither to take upon trust what any man shall tell you, without asking yourself what it is his interest or wish that you should believe, nor to give more weight to conjectures than the circumstances under which they are formed will warrant.

By the latest accounts that we have received, the Government, the Congress, and the constitution of the provinces of La Plata were overthrown; the province of Buenos Ayres stood alone, with Don Manuel de Sarratea as Governor, at its head. They were in negotiation with General Artigas, of the Oriental Banda, and with General Ramirez, commander of the Monteneros. In what those negotiations will result, we are to learn hereafter; and what their effect will be upon the relations of all with the Portuguese at Montevideo is yet to be seen. Should you remain at Buenos Ayres, we shall expect full communications from you as frequently as opportunities for transmitting them may occur. I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN M. FORBES, Esq.

Extract of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

SEPTEMBER 2, 1821.

I shall confine myself to a general summary of leading events since my last. The first in order of date is the total defeat of the party of Ramirez by a wing of the united armies of Santa Fe and Cordova, under Don Francisco de Bedoya, Substitute Governor of Cordova. The action was fought at Francisco, on the Rio Seco, on the 10th of July, and the news was most joyfully received here on the 21st of the same month.

I have great pleasure in announcing to you a new organization of this Government, which promises great solidity and character, and from whose exertions the most important reforms are daily taking place. The Departments of State and Treasury were, until the 18th of July last, united in one person, Don Juan Manuel de Luca; the junta then decreed that these departments should be separated, and the Governor called to the first, (Don Bernadino Rivadavia,) with the title of Minister of the Government and of Foreign Relations. Mr. Luca remained charged with the Department of Treasury until the 1st August when he offered his resignation, which was accepted, and a complementary decree of the 8th August, published with acceptance of the Governor. Don Manuel Jose Garcia, many years diplomatic agent of the Director at Rio Janeiro, has since been appointed to that office. These two gentlemen (Rivadavia and Garcia) both possess a great share of public confidence; have both acquired experience in public affairs by long residence near foreign courts; and they both seem animated by a zealous desire to establish order in the various branches of the Administration, and economy in the public expenditure. This spirit of reform, which was the great cause of the overthrow of Sarratea, by exciting the discontent and violent opposition of military men, now furnishes also a hope to the partisans of Pueyrredon, who are raising great clamor against the new Ministers, and working diligently to regain their influence. In short, the present moment seems to be the crisis of a struggle between public virtue and corruption, between a new-born impulse of public opinion growing in the liberty of the press with that of Parliamentary debate, and the rotten legacy of the viceroyalty, the deleterious influence of military patronage. It is a struggle, on the event of which hangs the future liberty and welfare of this province. May Heaven smile on the future efforts of virtue and patriotism! Another very important event has occurred since my last report. The annexation of the Banda Oriental to the kingdom of Brazil, and the recognition of the independence of these provinces by His Most Faithful Majesty King John—these measures were simultaneous and correlative. On the 28th July, Don Juan Manuel de Figuieredo presented himself to this Government with the character of Consul of Portugal and Brazil, and with a letter of credence from the Brazilian Secretary of State, acknowledging the independence of these provinces, and expressing a hope that these provinces would acknowledge any and all Governments of fact which should be admitted and obeyed by the people of any neighboring provinces. This Government received Mr. De Figuieredo with great courtesy, and passed over in silence the recognition with its implied condition. The whole business, on both sides, appears to me to be quite theatrical. Mr. Figuieredo, a conspicuous actor in the first scene, he retired suddenly from all political agencies, and from this life! On the morning of the 21st August, being apparently in perfect health, and whilst walking in his saloon, waiting for his breakfast, he fell down instantly dead! By order of Government, his body was opened by a surgeon, in presence of some distinguished law officers, and his stomach and bowels found to be in a healthful state; whence it results that he died of apoplexy. Soon after Mr. Rivadavia's coming into the ministry, to wit, on the 5th August, I was promised a long conference with him on all the objects of my agency; but as he came to me in company with Mr. Luca, I could only hold some desultory conversation touching cursorily on some topics. Mr. R. then promised me for the next Thursday a particular audience, but I am sorry to say that the fulfilment of this promise has been delayed from week to week to this hour.

I yesterday saw Mr. Rivadavia for a few minutes, and again received an apology for his delay of the long-promised conference. I took occasion to say that I was aware of his unceasing occupation in the arduous place he held, and must conform to his convenience, but that there was one subject on which I had been instructed to communicate the views of my Government, and which, by the information daily received, became most imperiously pressing, as interesting to the character of this Government, which I knew he had so much at heart. I then stated that, by late advices from the West Indies, the horrors of piracy, which had so justly excited universal indignation, were daily increasing, as well by the numbers of the vessels as by their strength of armament and the boldness of their nefarious enterprises; that, recently, a vessel fitted out here under the name of the Confederation had changed her name and her commander, and was captured under the commission of Artigas by a French frigate, and carried into Martinique, from whence the captain and a number of the crew, being seamen of the United States, had been sent to Philadelphia in a French brig for trial; that all these vessels were notoriously furnished with several different commissions, and, according to the privateering regulations of this province, they were to be deemed pirates; that one of them had recently fired on a Government brig of France, and killed the commander; that I was instructed by my Government to make the strongest remonstrances on this subject. To all these observations Mr. Rivadavia replied that this evil would no longer exist; that there would soon be given an order recalling all privateers; that he was fully convinced that the most important object with this Government is to acquire the good-will and friendship of all other Governments, and that he was determined to make every sacrifice to attain this great end. He said that Governments seated in perfect peace and security reasoned calmly on these subjects, but that his country had experienced so many difficulties in its struggle for independence that the Government had been compelled to adopt the strongest measures against the Spanish commerce; but, said he, "this is now all finished."

At the moment I am writing, a salvo of artillery, and the most extravagant demonstrations of joy through the streets, announce the capture of Lima by San Martin's besieging army. If this news be true, it puts the seal to the independence of South America. The Spanish royalty, driven from its last hope in these provinces, and enlightened by a representative Government, will, I think, within six months, acknowledge their independence.

Extract of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

SEPTEMBER 11, 1821.

Enclosed I transmit an important State paper published here—a manifest of the Governor and his secretary on the projet presented to the honorable junta in relation to the congress now assembled at Cordova, together with the projet submitted, which, as will be seen, is intended to lay the foundation for future federation. Messrs. Rivadavia and Garcia are pressing with great vigor their system of reform, and, by a strong blow at the root, have violently shaken the branches of the tree of corruption. Consternation has been spread through the ranks of smugglers, by the arrest and close imprisonment, the day before yesterday, of Don Fernando Calderon, first inspector of the custom-house. This man, although enjoying a very liberal salary, has notoriously patronised the unblushing atrocities of the giant smugglers who have totally dilapidated the revenues of the country for years past. The leading man, accustomed to ask and obtain every thing of the Government, yesterday solicited of the Governor a mitigation of the imprisonment of Mr. Calderon, and perhaps his discharge on bail. The Governor consulted Mr. Rivadavia on the expediency of listening to the call of mercy. The latter replied, very respectfully, to the Governor, that he certainly had the power and the responsibility for any measures he might adopt, but that, if his Excellency yielded to the solicitations in question, he (Mr. R.) must decline any further service as secretary. This firmness prevailed. The truth is, Mr. Rivadavia, being the father of the incipient system of order and virtue, from his growing influence, has become indispensable to the accomplishment of the views now cherished by the public opinion. If this system should prevail, the immediate effect of it will be the prevalence of civil over military influence.

Condition of Spanish South America.

Extract of a letter from John M. Forbes, Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1821.

I have a despatch from Judge Prevost, containing the gazettes from Lima, published since the revolution there, which I shall forward by the first direct opportunity. The night before the last, (26th instant,) the Governor (Rodriguez) received an official despatch from General San Martin, confirming the previous news of the surrender of Lima to the liberating army, and accompanied by gazettes giving the details of that important event. Yesterday morning this great event was announced to this city by salvos of artillery from the fort and national vessels, which were repeated at noon and at sunset. At five o'clock in the afternoon, the Governor, attended by his Ministers and all the public functionaries, went to the cathedral to attend a Te Deum, and in the evening the city was brilliantly illuminated; other public festivities are said to be contemplated, among which a ball by the Chilean Minister at the theatre, and another by the Government, are spoken of. In fact, this event is generally considered as a finishing blow in the contest for independence. Enclosed is a paper just published here, containing a familiar letter from San Martin, (addressed, I presume to his father-in-law, Mr. Escalada,) signed Pepe, which is the familiar abbreviation of Joseph; also, various documents relating to the taking possession of Lima; a correspondence between San Martin and the Archbishop of Lima; the declaration of the Cabildo, &c. By these public papers, it appears that San Martin has added to his fame by the moderation and respect for public opinion which he has manifested on this great occasion. Every thing here breathes joy and the brightest hope of the perfection of their political happiness. The congress at Cordova is now entirely lost in the contemplation of a grand congress, which it is said will be agreed on by the three great Republics of Peru, Chili, and La Plata. Perhaps the sister Colombia may be invited to this family party.

Enclosed I send you copies of my letter to Mr. Rivadavia on the subject of privateering, or rather of piracy, dated 14th September, copy of that Minister's reply, under 15th September, and of a conference I had with him on the 17th of the same month. Enclosed is also a minute of a previous conference with said Minister on the 5th August last.

Among the important events which have occurred on this side of the mountains, I must not omit to notice the total destruction of the party of Jose Miguel Carrera, and the public execution of that active, intelligent, and extraordinary man. Enclosed I herewith transmit two bulletins published here concerning this event. By the first, it will appear that a colonel (Don Manuel Arias) had organized a revolution in Carrera's band, which he communicated to the Governor of Mendoza on the condition of saving his own life, and those of some of his adherents. By the second, entitled "Detail of the destruction of Carrera," it will be seen that Carrera's party was totally defeated by the Mendozinos on the 31st August, and that, on the 4th of this month, Carrera was shot on the public square at Mendoza; he died with the most heroic courage, asking for only favor of his conquerors that he might be buried in the same grave with his two brothers, who were shot in the same city on a former occasion. It would be well for humanity if the story of this event stopped here; but I again have to state another act of savage ferocity. The murdered body of this brave and distinguished man was shockingly mutilated; his head was cut off and exposed in the square of Mendoza; his right arm was sent to the Governor of Cordova, and his left to the Punta San Luis. When these particulars were known here, they excited the sentiment of horror; and it has even been said that if this victim of the ferocity of their half savage brethren at Mendoza had been sent to this place, even his life would have been probably spared.

Carrera, by his great personal resources, had proved the most dangerous enemy of the present state of things in these provinces; and had San Martin failed in Peru, and had Carrera survived that failure, he would have menaced the tranquillity of Chili; thus his death is a great event for the present rulers here, although the manner of it may be very revolting to their more civilized breasts.

OCTOBER 1, 1821.

Since writing the foregoing, there has been a further publication of papers connected with the occupation of Lima, containing certain proclamations of Generals San Martin and Arenales; this publication I herewith enclose. The new ministers have very judiciously availed themselves of the present moment to propose to the junta a general amnesty, and that all those who have been exiled for differences of political opinion should be recalled to the bosom of their country: this proposition, so worthy the high-minded cause of the present ministry, and so well calculated to conciliate all parties, is to be discussed this evening at the junta. I shall attend the debate, seats being assigned to the foreign agents. Among the events tending to consolidate the moral and physical force of these provinces, it is said that a revolution has taken place in the Entre Rios against the brother of the slain Ramirez. At the head of this revolution is a Mr. Mansilla, of whose rank and history I am ignorant. The flotilla of this province is co-operating, and further assistance has been asked of Lopez, the Governor of Santa

Condition of Spanish South America.

Fe. The trade of the Baxada has been opened in consequence of this revolution. I just now met Mr. Rivadavia in the street, and took the occasion to remind him of the decree which he had promised to send me on the subject of privateering; he said it depended only on him to reduce it to writing, which he had not yet had time to do. He has given me reason to hope that he will call on me to-morrow; but the Herculean labor of cleansing the Augean stables so entirely occupies him, day and night, I sometimes fear he will be quite exhausted before he can accomplish it.

Copy of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., United States Agent at Buenos Ayres, to Mr. Rivadavia, Minister of Foreign Relations.

BUENOS AYRES, September 14, 1821.

SIR: Although I have been more than ten months in this city, I have never until now found a moment when, under all circumstances, I deemed it expedient to lay before this Government the sentiments and views of that of the United States in relation to many interesting subjects as contained in the instructions I received on my departure from Washington. On the recent organization of the Government, I intimated to you the desire to hold a full and frank conference, which you had the goodness to promise me at the commencement of the past month, but which has been unavoidably delayed by your more pressing occupations.

Appreciating as I do the great and efficient efforts now making by you in the cause of your country, I should most willingly continue to wait your convenience for the proposed conference, were I not impelled by recent information to press on the early attention of this Government one of the subjects on which I am instructed by that of the United States—I mean those indiscriminate violences which are daily committed on the ocean against the peaceful commerce of unoffending nations, under the various flags of the South American provinces.

It is now a long time since those violences have called forth the most pointed reprobation of many Governments in Europe, and of that of the United States. Several governments have made active efforts to repress them by force. These efforts have been unavailing; these privileged plunderers

"Can add colors to the chameleon,

"Change shapes with Proteus for advantage."

There is nothing fixed but the blackness of their purpose and the boldness of their atrocities. They are furnished with various commissions, and navigated by crews of men without country, without morality, and without other ties than those of crime and plunder. By the privateering regulations of Buenos Ayres, a privateer owned here, or commissioned by this Government, who shall be furnished with a commission from any other prince or republic, even if allied with this, "shall be adjudged a good prize, and her captain or commander punished as pirates." It is therefore under the sanction of its own laws that I presume to call the early and efficacious intervention of this Government to vindicate those violated laws. But, sir, it is, above all, from a full faith in those sentiments of honor, that love of order and justice which so eminently distinguish every step of the present administration, that I derive the strongest hope that this call will not be disregarded. The public gazettes recently received from the United States contain several well-authenticated statements of new outrages by these freebooters, whose numbers are multiplied, and the boldness of their wicked enterprises increased by their impunity. I will not swell this written communication by any extracts from the information received; but hope that, at an early day, it will be convenient for you to admit me to a personal conference, when I shall be happy to communicate with you in that spirit of frankness, which is the best pledge of friendship, as well the facts in my possession as the feelings of the Government of the United States on this highly interesting and important subject.

I avail myself with pleasure of this occasion to renew to you, Mr. Minister, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration and respect.

Mr. Rivadavia to Mr. Forbes.

BUENOS AYRES, Sept. 15, 1821.

The Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations has had the honor of receiving the official note from the agent of the United States under yesterday's date, and he considers it as his particular duty to make an acknowledgment of the honorable distinction the said agent shows towards him. With respect to the principal affair therein contained, he can only repeat what he had the satisfaction to make him acquainted with in his last interview, which was, that the Government had adopted every measure in its power to suppress the evils committed by privateers of this country towards the commerce of neutral nations from the abuse of their commissions. Nevertheless, the Minister of Foreign Relations feeling desirous of contributing towards the completion of these measures as far as they are capable of being made perfect, he will be happy to receive any further explanation on this subject that the agent of the United States may think proper to give him: for which purpose, it will be taken as an honor if the agent would take the trouble to call on the Minister at his house on Monday morning, the 17th instant, at eleven o'clock.

The Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations expresses his thanks to the agent for the distinction he confers upon him, and begs to return it by the assurances of his consideration and respect.

BERNARDO RIVADAVIA.

TO JOHN M. FORBES, Esq.

Extract of a minute of a conference with Mr. Rivadavia, Minister of State.

BUENOS AYRES, September 17, 1821.

I received this morning at ten o'clock, by the hands of one of the clerks of the department, an answer from the Minister of State to my letter of the 14th instant, containing an invitation to a conference at eleven o'clock at his house. Although the notice was too short to admit of any preparation, I gladly accepted the invitation, taking with me my instructions, including those intended for the late Commodore Perry. I found the Minister, Mr. Rivadavia, quite alone, and was, as always, well received. I commenced my conversation by very sincere assurances of the enthusiasm I felt in the present march of events, and compliments to the Minister on his zealous efforts for the establishment of order in the administration, and the formation of a sound public opinion in the country. I then observed that, not having had time to prepare extracts, I had brought my instructions in extenso, and would ask permission, in frankness and friendship, to read certain parts of them in the original language in which they were written, which I was aware was well understood by him. I then read the assurances of the good-will of the United States towards these provinces, and the interest they had constantly felt in the success of their efforts for independence. I continued through the history of our diplomatic correspondence and measures in relation to the South American affairs, to all which the Minister listened with much attention and apparent approbation. When I communicated to him the fact that the United States Government had proposed to those of France and England to acknowledge, in concert with them, the independence of Buenos Ayres, in reply to my question he confessed his previous ignorance of that fact. I then continued the forcible expositions in the instructions to Commodore Perry of the evils and horrors of the system of piracy as practised by vessels carrying various colors of the South American provinces, and stated to him that the United States would not acknowledge as legal any commission granted in blank; which he said was perfectly just, and continued by saying that he was fully sensible of all the injury which had been done to the cause and character of these provinces, and deprecated as much as any one the atrocities which had been committed on neutral commerce; that the Government had determined on an entire change of system, and that, probably, this day a decree would be drawn up revoking all privateer commissions, and ordering them all to return within a given period. But this decree would be communicated to me, when it would be seen if any thing more efficacious remained to be done within the scope of the Government's authority. I observed that the decision of the Government was in perfect unison with the whole system now going into operation, eminently wise and politic, and would have a most important influence on the opinion of other nations in regard to this country; that, as nothing had so much operated to damp the enthusiasm of my countrymen in favor of South American liberty as the enormities committed under the patriot flags, so nothing would so effectually tend to reanimate their good wishes as the suppression of those crying abuses. I stated to the Minister the measures adopted by Congress to repress the predatory system, and particularly the act of the 20th of April, 1815, of which he requested and I promised a copy. I next read from the instruction of 12th July, 1820, the remarks on the subject of commercial preferences, and the magnanimous feeling with which the Government of the United States disclaimed any wish to barter an acknowledgment of the independence of these provinces for any exclusive advantages in their commerce; at the same time, their firm reliance that no such exclusive privileges would be granted to other nations to the prejudice of the United States. On this, Mr. Rivadavia assured me that it was the firm determination of this Government to grant no exclusive privileges of commerce to any nation whatever, and that I might communicate this decision to my Government, with an assurance that the most complete reliance might be placed on it. The Minister proceeded, that his most decided opinion was, that no measure whatever ought to be taken to solicit an acknowledgment of the independence of these provinces by any Government. He expressed himself in flattering terms of his good-will towards me personally, and added, that it would be an abuse of the confidence I had evinced towards him if he were to engage me to make any representations to my Government tending to that end, and that he was much less disposed to take any such measure towards any Government of Europe; that such proceeding must operate, if unsuccessful, to the humiliation of the provinces, and, if successful, to mislead the people, by persuading them that such recognition was all-sufficient to their political existence and happiness; that, in his opinion, the most efficacious system would be to establish order and wise institutions of government throughout the provinces, and to show themselves worthy of the fraternity of other nations, when it would be voluntarily offered; that such voluntary recognition, in every point of view would be much more beneficial than that protection which should result from a compromise of honor and interest; that he had told his countrymen, de haute voix, his sentiments on the important topic of self-government; that much was to be done, but that he hoped to see the successful progress of a sound system of domestic and foreign policy. Our conference lasted, with a short interruption, nearly two hours, and we separated with assurances of mutual satisfaction.

Condition of Spanish South America.

An exact minute taken immediately after the conference.

SIR: Enclosed I have the honor to transmit a correct copy of the act of Congress passed on the 20th of April, 1818, for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, to which act reference was had in the conference to which you did me the honor to admit me on Monday, the 17th instant.

I pray you, Mr. Minister, to accept the renewed assurances of my highest consideration and respect.

Hon. B. RIVADAVIA, Minister, &c.

Mr. Rivadavia to Mr. Forbes.

BUENOS AYRES, Oct. 6, 1821.

The Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations, in consequence of the offer made, has the honor to transmit to the agent of the United States a copy of the decree which has just been issued by the Department of War and Marine concerning privateering.

The Minister salutes the agent with his most distinguished consideration.

BERNARDO RIVADAVIA.

DECREE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
Buenos Ayres, October 6, 1821.

Among the resources which the unfortunate rights of war have rendered lawful, and its object necessary, is privateering. The wars of the independence of the provinces of Holland and of the United States of North America have proved that this kind of warfare is the most advantageous for a country which prepares to defend its independence against a more ancient and remote country that has governed it. It is impossible to prevent or repress all the abuses which may result from privateering. The Government which finds itself under the painful necessity of authorizing, and even of encouraging it, has only two ways of lessening its illegal consequences, and in so far has only two obligations in this respect: the first is, to dictate such rules and take such precautions and guarantees as may correct abuses, not suffering them to pass unpunished. In this respect the Government of these provinces has fulfilled its duty, and the regulation of privateers proves it. The other obligation is, to put an end to this kind of warfare, either when it shall be no longer necessary to the object which induced it, or when the effect which it produces no longer equals the risks and inconvenience which result from it. The Government considers these two cases as having taken place, and, in virtue thereof, it has agreed upon, and now decrees, the following articles:

1. In future, no commission of privateering whatever shall be granted without a previous solemn publication, expressing the cause which obliges the Government to have recourse to this measure.

2. Every individual who possesses any commission, and shall be now in the territory of this province, shall be obliged to present it to the Minister of Marine within fifteen days from the date of this decree.

3. Those individuals who hold privateer commissions, and are in countries situated on the other side of the equinoctial line, or on the coast of the Pacific, shall be held to present the said commissions at the Ministry of Marine within the term of eight months.

4. The sureties given shall answer for the fulfilment of the foregoing articles.

5. Every commander of a vessel armed as a privateer in virtue of a commission of any one of the Governments which have commanded in this capital, on sight of this decree, shall cease to cruise, and shall put into port to disarm and return his commission.

6. Every one who shall contravene the preceding article will incur the pains of piracy.

7. Every vessel which, after the term of eight months from the date of this decree, shall continue to cruise under the authority of a commission of the Government of this country, shall be treated as a pirate.

8. The Minister of War and Marine is charged with the execution of this decree.

MARTIN RODRIGUEZ,

Minister of War and Marine.

FRANCISCO DE LA CRUZ.

Copy of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

OCTOBER 8, 1821.

SIR: The detention of the vessel by which I had prepared to send the foregoing despatch furnishes an opportunity to communicate a translation of the promised decree for suppressing privateering. It has not yet been published here, but will undoubtedly appear in the first official register, which will perhaps be printed to-morrow or next day. I hope that the terms of it will prove satisfactory to the Government of the United States. Although the right is reserved of resorting again to this kind of warfare, yet I hope that the restrictions under which it will be renewed will be more efficient to guard against those abuses which have heretofore been so justly and extensively complained of.

By the schooner Essex, to sail to-morrow for Providence, I shall have the honor to transmit duplicates, together with Judge Prevost's despatch, mentioned in the foregoing. I am, &c.,

JOHN M. FORBES.

OCTOBER 11, 1821.

P. S.—By this vessel, (the Essex, via Providence,) I send Judge Prevost's despatch, and a large file of newspapers. The decree against privateering was published yesterday in the Registro Oficial.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec. of State.

Extracts of a letter from J. M. Forbes, Esq., to the Secretary of State, dated

BUENOS AYRES, October 26, 1821.

I have previously reported the total destruction of the parties of Ramirez and Carrera, together with the death of those chiefs, the barbarous mutilation of their bodies, &c. By these events, the influence of this province over the others is much increased, and, by the wise course of the present administration, the moral force of a sound and exemplary political deportment will be added to the success of their arms; and I hope that the day is not far distant when all the jarring jealousies which have hitherto so perniciously counteracted the progress of civil liberty will be put to silence, and the wise men of every section of this country will be brought to a cordial co-operation to attain the high objects of their political destiny. But much, very much, remains to be done before the general union of the great sections of this almost boundless country in any one system of government can be effected.

In the mean time, Rivadavia and Garcia, firm as they are enlightened and patriotic, are pursuing "the even tenor of their way." They have added public credit to the other sinews of war which this province before possessed, by repaying with great punctuality, in gold, several loans, (a thing without example in the history of this revolution;) they enjoy now to so great a degree the confidence of the community, that I believe they could borrow to any reasonable amount for an immediate exigency. It is said, also, that an entirely new system of finance is agreed on, and will appear in a few days. By this tariff, as it has been represented to me, the duties, with a very few exceptions, will be ad valorem, and will vary from five to fifteen per cent. Every possible measure is taken to prevent smuggling, and public opinion and morality are cherished by the Government. If, therefore, Buenos Ayres, in all the darkness of her most gloomy period, public sentiment paralyzed by deadly dissensions, and public resources completely dilapidated, has been able to struggle successfully against the machinations of the other provinces, it is not too rash to expect that when she fights with a twofold armament of reason and force, seconded by a vigorous public credit, the victory must eventually be hers. The most deplorable result, however, of these continued agitations, is the necessity of continuing an onerous military establishment.

The most alarming state of agitation prevails in the neighboring kingdom of Brazil. It was some days since confidently reported, on the authority of Captain McLean, of the British Government brig Beaver, in six days from Rio to Montevideo, that Prince Don Pedro was to have been crowned King of Brazil on the 13th of the present month. Subsequent accounts contradict this fact, and it is now no longer believed. It is, however, well known that the public mind there is in a most feverish state, and, should civil war burst forth, it would be the signal of the emancipation of a numberless horde of slaves, and the most horrid scenes of blood and devastation would overwhelm that kingdom, and eventually threaten these provinces, where it would find easy victims in the scanty white population here. The progress of this all-destroying flame could only be arrested by the Indians, and, in such a conflict, this delightful country would be totally lost to civilization.

Mr. Forbes to the Secretary of State.—Extract.

BUENOS AYRES, November 8, 1821.

Since my last respects, we have received news from Lima and Chili, by which it appears that the royalist army, which had evacuated Lima on the 6th July under La Serna, had returned on the 22d August under the command of Canterac, La

Serna remaining sick at Xauxa. The strength of the returning army was between three and four thousand men; the official accounts say that they avoided an engagement with San Martin, but I have seen several private letters, and one from a citizen of the United States, who was two days in San Martin's camp, in view of the royalist troops, and who states that San Martin's force was much superior, and extremely anxious to give battle; but that San Martin retired, and permitted the unmolested march of the royalists into Callao. The motive of such a proceeding is generally deemed strange and incomprehensible; but it occurs to me that San Martin, being sure of eventually forcing the garrison of Callao, augmented as it is, to a capitulation, prefers to continue his influence by protracting the military conflict until the civil organization of this new-born Republic shall be completed, rather than to put down the remnant of the royal troops, and leave the country to the agonies of conflicting factions; or, in a few words, to make himself, at his own choice, King, Dictator, or Director. He has at present taken the head of the civil and military power, with the title of Protector. All accounts agree in the enthusiasm for independence prevailing in Lima. On the late return of the royalist troops, it became necessary to imprison twelve hundred old Spaniards, as it is said, to preserve them from the popular fury. I have conversed on these events with several gentlemen well acquainted with Peru and Lima, and particularly with a sensible friar, native of, and, until recently, resident at Lima, who agrees in the general opinion that the return of the troops to Callao is a most fortunate event, inasmuch as it places the termination of the war in the hands of San Martin; whereas, had La Serna kept the country, and increased his forces, he might have continued the war for a very long time. I send enclosed a bulletin issued on the subject, by which you will be able to see and appreciate events in their detail.

Of this province I have only to say that there are still active but occult efforts making to overturn the present administration, and bring the Pueyrredon party into power.

Extracts of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

NOVEMBER 13, 1821.

Since my last, we have the important news of the surrender of Callao. I send enclosed the bulletin published here, by which you will see the particulars of the capitulation. Private letters state that Canterac's army was much harassed on its retreat, and was still pursued. It is said that eight hundred of his army had joined that of San Martin. It was thought that there would not remain five hundred men to join La Serna. I have seen a private letter which states that when the report reached Lima of Canterac's approach, funds to the amount of five or six hundred thousand dollars were embarked on board the ships at Ancon. Lord Cochrane had been for some time making every exertion to procure money to pay off the crews of his ships, but without effect.

On hearing that this amount was on board the different transports, he repaired to Ancon with the O'Higgins and Esmeralda, and forcibly took possession of the whole sum, in defiance of the strong representations of the General, and immediately paid the arrearage due to his men. Report says that he has not dared to put his foot on shore since he took this violent measure.

NOVEMBER 16, 1821.

The "Registro Oficial," No. 13, published yesterday, contains the resolution of the honorable junta on the subject of general amnesty, and oblivion of political acts and opinions, together with a decree of the Governor, by which all those who have been exiled under the special powers vested in the Executive by the decree of 6th of October, 1820, and all who have voluntarily absented themselves to avoid the evils of political agitation, may forthwith return without passports; only nine persons are excepted from this amnesty, and they are not named.

It is said that an officer has arrived here, sent by the Governor of Tucuman, charged to solicit military aid to deliver that province and its vicinity of the presence of the royalist troops, and at the same time to declare a perfect coincidence of opinion with that put forth by this Government on the subject of the confederation. Every thing continues to go on well here. Enclosed I send a printed paper entitled Dictamen de un Arribero, (which means citizens of the interior provinces.) It goes to maintain the inexpediency of a confederation at present, which is the ground taken by this province.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Prevost, Agent of the United States in South America, to the Secretary of State.

ST. JAGO DE CHILI, June 30, 1821.

In my last I mentioned the departure of Lord Cochrane from Huacho, with six hundred troops, for the purpose of landing them somewhere to the southward of the capital, so as to intercept the supplies from that quarter. It is now ascertained that his lordship has directed this force to a different point, with objects distinct from those contemplated by the General. After proceeding to Pisco, and pillaging that place, he went to Arica, where there was a considerable quantity of merchandise in deposit for the market of Lima, took possession of the town at the point of the bayonet, and as much of the moveable property as he could grasp. It is the third or fourth time different sections of the coast have been thus distressed by a mode of warfare injurious to the cause, always at variance with that strictly enjoined and as rigidly adhered to by the General. In addition to which, he has lately committed outrages upon the British flag, by impressing seamen, and by detaining the vessels from which they were taken, in order to use them as transports. These acts, of course, are disavowed by the Government; but they have given rise to a correspondence which threatened a serious result. Among other subjects, that of the blockade was introduced: the one insisting upon its nullity in toto, if contemplated to embrace any portion of the coast not covered by an actual force; the other denying the consequence, and maintaining the sufficiency of the force. Although this Government might have sustained the position assumed, by recurring to British practice, yet, in their situation, it was neither prudent nor justifiable to assume any equivocal grounds, particularly on such a subject; and I thought it proper therefore, to present a note to the Secretary of State, asking the truth of the case, and stating specifically the principle to be recognised. No. 1 is a copy of mine, and No. 2 of that of the Director, written in our language and in his own handwriting. I had hoped [to have procured] the correspondence, but the delays are such here in all the public offices that I cannot avail myself of it for this opportunity; it is not now, however, important, except for the greater satisfaction of the President, inasmuch as an order has been issued in conformity with his note, and conveyed to Sir Thomas Hardy, who acquiesced in its propriety. There have been upwards of a dozen English merchantmen under capture, some of which have already been condemned.

Nothing has reached us from the army later than the 4th of May, when San Martin had resumed his former station at Ancon, within a few leagues of the capital. It is feared here that the absence of Lord Cochrane on the expedition I have already referred to may retard the views of the General, if not defeat the object of his approach. Bolivar has sent a considerable force to Guayaquil, seven hundred of which have already landed at the place, from whence they are to march for the Congress of Quito.

No. 1.

Mr. Prevost to Mr. Joaquin de Echeveria, Secretary of State of the Republic of Chili.

ST. JAGO DE CHILI, June 18, 1821.

SIR: I understand that there is a letter in town from Sir Thomas Hardy, addressed to the British merchants of this place, in which it is stated that this Government considers the whole coast of Peru south of the capital as under blockade, although there is no force stationed before any one port except that of Callao. This information is so much at variance with the impressions I have uniformly received during my residence here, that I must believe some mistake has arisen either with my informant or with the British admiral.

Will you therefore allow me, sir, to ask from you the fact on this subject? It is a question of great moment, one of peculiar interest in the United States since our last contest with Great Britain, and one upon which I am anxious that there should exist no difference of opinion. The principle upon which the right of exclusion from any specific port is founded, is the temporary sovereignty acquired by the presence of the force of one belligerent, competent, as to the other, to control the mouth of such port or harbor. Hence, it is obvious that to the legal exercise of the rights growing out of the blockade the force must be permanent in its station.

There will offer a conveyance to the United States in a few days, of which I could wish to avail myself, as well to satisfy the President of the strict adherence to principles maintained by his Excellency the Supreme Director, as to defeat the effects of rumors that must have a pernicious tendency at home.

J. B. PREVOST.

HON. JOAQUIN DE ECHEVERIA.

No. 2.

General O'Higgins to Mr. Prevost.

JUNE 23, 1821.

MY DEAR SIR: I am very much obliged to you for the indication which favors me with your note of this day. You might be sure of my resolution about the necessity of an actual force to be stationed at the sight of the ports that are to constitute the blockade. This very moment I am answering Sir Thomas Hardy about this point, declaring that must be considered as such to the ports from Pisco to Ancon, and orders will be despatched to the vice admiral, Lord Cochrane, and General San Martin, by the first safe conduct.

By next Tuesday's post to Valparaiso will be sent to you, by the Minister of State, all which has occurred about the matter; meanwhile, I remain yours, most sincerely,

B. O'HIGGINS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Hogan, Commercial Agent of the United States at Valparaiso, to the Secretary of State, dated

AUGUST 18, 1821.

I have now the honor to inform you that, on the 13th instant, a despatch vessel arrived here from Callao, which place she left on the 23d ultimo, with advices to this Government of the surrender of Lima to General San Martin, and of the inhabitants having sworn to the independence of the place. On the 12th of July the Spanish troops proceeded to the mountains with their General, who first placed a garrison of two thousand men in Callao, which place had not surrendered when the despatch came away, but could not be expected to hold out, as there was not more than a week's provision in the fortress, which was to be attacked by land and by sea from the squadron. The sufferings of the people in Lima for want of breadstuffs and other food had been great; but there is no public gazette issued explanatory of the proceedings, and private letters are short and unsatisfactory. It is impossible to say to what extent they had carried their attachment to royalty, or rather their opposition to being conquered by the forces of Chili, whom they had even treated and considered as an inferior people, not entitled to the enjoyment of equal rights with themselves. To expect them to submit tamely to the dictation of this slip of country is, I believe, more than will be realized, although there can never be any doubt of the country of South America facing the Pacific ocean being forever free from the Government of Old Spain.

An additional export duty of 15 per cent. is laid by this Government upon all articles shipped from this port for Lima; many vessels are in port ready to depart as soon as permitted. The Constellation was at Callao, and may (by report only) be expected here soon.

Mr. Prevost is expected from Santiago, to embark by the first vessel from Lima. I send this letter in duplicate by two ships bound this day to London, in the hope that either may be put on board of some vessel bound to the United States. I have also written to Mr. Rush by them, requesting he may communicate the information by the earliest opportunity.

Soon after my arrival here, I wrote to Captain Ridgely, requesting he would use his endeavors to inform you, by way of Panama, of the fall of that important section of South America, which I doubt not will be the first communication you will receive.

The senors who compose it having yesterday assembled in the most excellent Senate, with the most excellent and most illustrious senor the Archbishop of this holy Metropolitan church, the prelates of the religious convents, titulars of Castile, and various neighbors of this capital, for the purpose of fulfilling what had been provided in the official letter of the most excellent senor the General-in-chief of the liberating army of Peru, Don Jose de San Martin, the contents of which were read; and persuaded thereof, reduced to what persons of known probity, learning, and patriotism, who inhabit this capital, would express, if the general opinion for independence had been resolved on, which vote would serve as a guide to the said General for proceeding to take the oath: all the senors agreeing for themselves, and satisfied of the opinion of the inhabitants of the capital, said that the general will was decided for the independence of Peru of the Spanish dominion, and of any other foreign dominion whatever, and that they would proceed to its sanction by means of the corresponding oath; it was compared with a certified copy of this act to the same most excellent senor, and the senors signed it.

Condition of Spanish South America.

Mr. Brent, Chargé des Affaires of the United States at Madrid, to the Secretary of State.

MADRID, July 10, 1821.

SIR: The late session of the Cortes had far advanced when most of the deputies from Mexico arrived. They had been detained two months at Vera Cruz by the commander of the frigate Pronta, and were at last obliged to make the best of their way to Spain in foreign vessels, running every risk, and incurring great expense. They had not been long in Madrid when they began to press their claims; and on the 3d of May, Count Toreno, one of the most distinguished members of the Cortes of Old Spain, a friend, as is supposed, to their cause, made a motion in the Cortes that a special committee be appointed, composed of deputies of Ultramar and Europe, to consider of and propose, conjointly with the Executive, such measures as they should deem most proper "to terminate the dissensions prevailing in the various parts of America." This motion was agreed to, and the committee appointed.

While this committee were engaged in their important duties the news was received, about the beginning of June, of the insurrection of Iturbide, and the form of Government proposed by him to be adopted, (copy of which I transmit, marked A,) and, in consequence of a resolution offered by an American deputy, the Ministers appeared on the 4th June before the Cortes, to give an account of the occurrences that had taken place in New Spain. The American deputies availed themselves of this occasion to show to the Cortes and Executive the impracticability of the provinces of America being governed as those of the Peninsula, according to the provisions of the Constitution, on account of their great distance from the metropolis; proved the necessity of adopting prompt and efficacious measures, and pressed the Government and committee to come to an early decision. They then moved that the Government should be requested to direct, without delay, the Viceroy of Mexico to inform Iturbide that the Cortes were occupied in projecting a plan of government for America, and to propose a suspension of hostilities until the resolution should be finally made by the Cortes and Executive. It was stated that, should this step be taken, they were perfectly convinced that Iturbide, and those under his standard, would suspend hostilities the moment they knew that the deputies of New Spain had arrived at the capital in time to be able to make the "just reclamations of those Spaniards." This was not agreed to. A resolution was then offered and adopted, directing that the Minister of Ultramar, "in consideration of the state of New Spain, should propose the measures he might think proper whilst the Cortes were occupied in taking radical ones for its complete pacification."

The committee labored with great assiduity, and had various conferences with the Ministers, who, at first, coincided in the opinions advanced, and in the arrangement proposed by it to be adopted in regard to Spanish America, and which would have been satisfactory to the American deputies.

When, however, it was laid before the King, he was strenuously opposed to it on the ground, as he informed them, that the arrangement contemplated would be a violation of the Constitution; that the public opinion was not prepared for it; that it was against the interest, both of the Peninsula and America; and, finally, he spoke of the opposition that might be made to it by foreign Powers, since they had not been consulted. In consequence of this, the accord between the Ministers and committee ceased; and as according to the resolutions of Count Toreno, which gave rise to the appointment of the committee, it was unauthorized, without the concurrence of the Executive, to offer any plan, none was proposed to the Cortes. The committee made their report to the Cortes on the 24th June, (copy marked B,) and state that the Government not believing that the moment had arrived of convenience and necessity for the adoption of certain measures, they can do nothing more than excite the zeal of the Ministers, to the end that the wished-for moment may be accelerated, and recommend that the Executive should be pressed "to present to their deliberations, with the greatest despatch, the fundamental measures they may think proper, as well for the just and complete pacification of the revolted provinces of America, as to secure to all of them the enjoyment of a firm and solid happiness."

The disappointment and vexation of the American deputies at this result was proportionate to the flattering hopes that had been excited by the unanimity of sentiment that prevailed at the first conferences of the Ministers and committee. They then determined to present, themselves, a plan to the Cortes, having the object in view; and the propositions (copy marked C) were made on the 25th June, which, in substance, are the same as those that had at first met the approbation of the Ministers.

These propositions are, that there shall be three divisions made of America; in each a Cortes, having the powers delegated by the Constitution to the General Cortes, with the exception of the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th powers, that part of the 7th relative to the sanction of treaties, and the second part of the 27th power. In each division, a delegate appointed by the King from among the persons most distinguished for their high qualifications, not excluding members of the royal family, removable at his will, who shall exercise, in the name of the King, the executive power, to be inviolable with respect to the American Cortes, and only responsible to the King and General Cortes. In each, four Ministers: of the interior, of finance, of grace and justice, and of war and marine. In each, a supreme tribunal of justice and a council of state. The commerce between the Peninsula and America to be considered as from one province to another; and the inhabitants of the latter to have equal eligibility with those of the former to all public employments.

New Spain binds herself to pay 200,000,000 reals in six years, and contribute annually 40,000,000 reals to the support of the navy; the other parts of America to contribute in the manner that shall be subsequently arranged. New Spain will also pay all the debt contracted within its territory; and all public property to belong to it. On the sitting of the 25th of June, two of the deputies offered an amendment to the fifth article, having for its object to prevent the appointment of delegates being conferred on any of the royal family.

These propositions were preceded by an exposé read in the Cortes, a copy of which I transmit herewith. In it they state that "they desire the Constitution which ought to make them happy, but which, in the actual state of things, they consider to be a beautiful theory, that can only be reduced to practice in the Peninsula. The Americans are freemen, are Spaniards, have the same rights as the Peninsulars; they are acquainted with, and have sufficient virtue to support them."

The measures recommended by the committee (to request the Government to present a plan at an early period) have been acted upon, as you will perceive by the King's speech, in which he says that his Government, "urged by the Cortes to propose the measures they may think proper for their welfare, on a consideration of the state of those countries, will do so immediately, and with all possible generosity." These will, without doubt, be proposed on the meeting of the Cortes extraordinary, which the speech of the President of the Cortes to the King will have shown you is to take place. It is supposed that its convocation will not be delayed longer than the 1st of October, if so long.

You will perceive that the deputies do not demand an acknowledgment of independence, and pretend not even to aspire to it; and they have declared in the Cortes, on the 4th June, that, if the revolutionists desire independence, it is because means have not been devised that should make the welfare of those provinces compatible with their union with the Peninsula.

The commissioners of Bolivar, (who are still here,) on the contrary, insist upon the acknowledgment of their independence as the basis of any arrangement with Spain. Nothing has been concluded between them and this Government, and all negotiation is suspended.

It is difficult to conjecture what will be the determination of the Cortes and the Executive on this great and interesting question, when we consider, on the one hand, that they cannot be wholly blind to the just claims, the strength, and resources of America, and view, on the other, the prejudices and illiberality that still exist in a high degree in the Executive, and a great portion of the members of the Cortes, and the observation in the King's speech, "that the Spaniards of both hemispheres ought to be persuaded there is nothing he desires so much as their felicity, founded in the integrity of the monarchy, and in the observance of the constitution."

As far as I have been able to form an opinion, it is, that the foreign Powers, during the agitation of the American question, have endeavored to prevent any arrangement between the parties.

On the 9th instant I received a note from Mr. Ravenga, one of the commissioners of Bolivar, requesting an interview with me, (copy marked D,) to which I immediately replied, (copy marked E,) stating that I would receive him that very evening.

In this interview he spoke of his mission to Spain. He said that, when he left Colombia, he had no idea of meeting with the least obstacle; he had calculated to a certainty that his object would immediately be accomplished. He spoke of the ignorance of this country of the real state of Spanish America, of their illiberality, and their prejudices, with warmth, and particularly so of the expression of the King, in his speech, respecting Spanish America. He calculated, he said, upon the friendship of the United States to promote the independence of the Republic of Colombia; he had a full conviction that he could rely upon it. Mr. Monroe, when Secretary of State, had informed him that all the Ministers of the United States in Europe had instructions to advance the acknowledgment of their independence by foreign Powers.

I sympathized with him in the unpleasant situation in which he was placed, and feared that the sentiment in Spain was not as favorable as could be desired. He was perfectly justified, I said, in relying upon the good dispositions of the United States. It was their interest and their sincere wish that the acknowledgment of the independence of Spanish America should be accelerated. The United States had not only been more forward than any other Power in publishing to the world their wishes with respect to her, but had accompanied them with actions, which certainly afforded the best proof of their sincerity; and, among them, I adverted to the Message of the President to the Congress of the United States at the commencement of its last session, in which, alluding to the proposed negotiation between the late colonies and Spain, the basis of which, if entered upon, would be the acknowledgment of their independence, he says: "To promote that result by friendly counsels, including Spain herself, has been the uniform policy of the Government of the United States."

The friendship of the United States, he said, was very grateful to the Republic of Colombia, and he hoped and expected that, at the commencement of the next meeting of Congress, the acknowledgment of its independence would be decided upon; the moment had arrived when all the Powers of the world would see the propriety of it. He calculated that the United States would be the first to take this step; hoped to see a confederacy of republics throughout North and South America, united by the strongest ties of friendship and interest; and he trusted that I would use my exertions to promote the object he so much desired.

I heartily concurred with him in the hope that all Governments would resolve to adopt a measure so conformable to justice; joined with him in the agreeable anticipations of the progress of free principles of government, of the intimate union and brilliant prospects of the States of our new world. I presumed, I said, it was not necessary to bring to his mind the high interest felt by the United States in their welfare—an interest in which I deeply participated and desired, as much as he possibly could, the happiness of our Spanish American brethren. What would be the determination of the United States at the period of the commencement of Congress, it was impossible for me to foresee; whether they would consider it a seasonable moment for doing that which was so much desired, was a point I could not resolve.

In this interview, Mr. Ravenga confirmed to me what I had previously learned, that his instructions do not authorize any terms short of the acknowledgment of independence. I observed to him that I presumed no arrangement would be made under them that might have an injurious bearing on the commercial interests of the United States. To this his reply was, that none would be entered into by the Republic of Colombia with Spain that would not be perfectly reciprocal.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ARTICLE 1. The religion of New Spain is, and shall be, the Roman Catholic Apostolical, without tolerating any other.

2. New Spain is independent of Old Spain, and of every other Power, even on our continent.

3. Its Government shall be a moderate monarchy, according to a constitution peculiarly adapted for the empire.

4. Ferdinand VII. shall be Emperor; and if he do not come in person to Mexico to make oath before the Cortes within the time prescribed by them, the most serene infants Don Carlos, Don Francisco de Paula, the Archduke Charles, or some other branch of the reigning family, shall be appointed in his place by the Congress.

5. Until the meeting of the Cortes, there shall be a Junta, which shall have their union for its object, and the compliance with this plan in its whole extent.

6. Said Junta, which shall be styled Governmental, must be composed of the deputies mentioned in the official letter of the Viceroy.

7. Until Ferdinand VII.'s arrival in Mexico, and his taking the oath, the Junta will govern in the name of His Majesty, in virtue of the oath of fidelity taken by the nation; but until His Majesty hath sworn, any orders he may give shall be suspended.

8. If Ferdinand VII. should not deign to come to Mexico, the Junta or Regency shall govern in the name of the nation, until it be resolved who shall be crowned Emperor.

9. This Government shall be sustained by the army of the three guarantees, of which mention shall be made hereafter.

10. The Cortes shall resolve whether the Junta shall continue, or a regency be substituted in its place, until the arrival of the person who is to be crowned.

11. The Cortes shall immediately establish the constitution of the Mexican empire.

12. All the inhabitants of New Spain, without distinction of Africans, Europeans, or Indians, are citizens of this monarchy, with eligibility to all employments according to their virtues or merits.

13. The person of every citizen and his property shall be respected and protected by the Government.

14. The clergy, secular and regular, shall preserve all their privileges and pre-eminences.

15. The Junta shall take care that every branch of the State remain without any alteration, and all the officers, political and ecclesiastical, civil and military, on the same footing as at present. They alone shall be removed who decline entering into this plan, substituting in their place those persons who are most distinguished for their virtue and merit.

16. A protecting army shall be formed, under the title of the three guarantees, because it takes under its protection, 1st. The preservation of the Catholic religion, co-operating, with all its efforts, that there may not be a mixture of any other sect, and attacking all the enemies who may injure it; 2d. The independence under the system already manifested; 3d. The intimate union of Americans and Europeans, guarantying such fundamental bases of the felicity of New Spain. Each individual, from first to last, will prefer sacrificing his life rather than permit the infraction of any of them.

17. The troops of the army shall observe the most strict discipline, according to their regulations, and the chiefs and officers shall remain on the same standing as at present, that is, in their respective classes, with eligibility to such public employments as are vacant, or may vacate in consequence of those who may not wish to follow their career, or any other cause, and those which may be considered as necessary or convenient.

18. The troops of said army shall be considered as of the line.

19. In the same light shall be considered those who may afterwards adopt this plan. Those who do not defer it, those of the former system of independence who shall immediately join said army, and the countrymen who may desire to enlist, shall be considered as troops of national militia; and the form of each for the interior and exterior security of the empire shall be dictated by the Cortes.

20. The employments shall be conceded to true merit, in virtue of references to the chiefs, and in the name of the nation.

21. While the Cortes are assembling, the proceedings against criminals shall be according to the Spanish constitution.

22. For conspiring against the independence, criminals shall be imprisoned until the Cortes decide the greatest punishment next to "lesa Majestad Divina."

23. A strict watch shall be kept over those who may attempt to create disunion, and they shall be reputed conspirators against the independence.

24. As the Cortes which are about to be installed are to be constituent, it is necessary that the deputies should receive sufficient powers to that effect, and, consequently, the electors ought to be informed that their representatives are to be for the Congress of Mexico, and not of Madrid. The Junta will prescribe just rules for the elections, and will fix the necessary time for them, and the opening of the Congress.

Since the elections cannot take place in March, the term shall be shortened as much as possible.

ITURBIDE.

IGÜALA, February 24.

B.

The special committee, appointed to propose to the Cortes what it judges most conducive to put a stop in the most effectual manner to the disputes and dissensions which unfortunately prevail in the provinces of America, is duly penetrated with the importance of the charge, and desirous of corresponding to the confidence with which the Cortes has honored it. Few questions of such magnitude can be presented to the deliberations of a legislative assembly and to the resolves of a Government as that which at present occupies the attention of the Spanish Cortes; on their resolution and the wisdom of their measures depend the greatest events, perhaps the tranquillity of America, and the rapid civilization of the whole world. Spain seems destined to give to the world, from time to time, striking examples of grandeur, by turns heroidal, or singularly original. The remote seas and regions discovered by her sons since the time of Columbus, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; the renowned valor and martial deeds (which border on the fabulous) of Cortes, Balboa, and Pizarro, did not suffice to their glory; nor that Sebastian del Cano, in his ship Victory, styled the Competitor of the Sun, should be the first to sail round the globe; to complete its measure, they added the arts, civilization, and the religion of their fathers; those vast regions participated of the benefits enjoyed in Europe, and the discoverers did not delay in making extensive to them the advantages derived from their own country. With what enthusiasm and pleasure (as we are assured by Inca Garcilaso) they assembled to enjoy in reciprocal union, and to spread, by their care and attention, over the whole country, the first productions of Europe. The laws relative to India are an eternal monument of the desire which always animated the Spanish Government that America should be treated with the same care and equality as the other provinces of Europe; they state that its natives shall be treated, favored, and defended as the other subjects of the Peninsula. From such just and prudent policy resulted the advantages which afterwards were derived. Cities were erected, which, for their population, beauty, and extension, rivalled the principal in Europe; their products served to augment the traffic and commerce of the whole world; the sons of America, with their talents and wisdom, enlightened the country of Manco Capac and Montezuma; and, not satisfied with spreading their knowledge over their native land, they have come to Europe to co-operate in the amelioration and prosperity of the Spains, it being conspicuous that many estimable deputies from thence, in the anterior and present Cortes, have taken an active and very principal part in the most important decisions. Such are the fruits which have been collected from the civilization and culture which Spain has succeeded in diffusing beyond the Atlantic, and from them are most evident the injustice and levity with which foreign writers have spoken of Spanish domineering in those regions. The disorders and injustice that there have been there have not arisen from the laws, nor from the interests, nor from the ambition of the metropolis, but from the men, the prejudices of the age, from the evils under which Spain herself groaned, and from the distance which always rendered null the responsibility of the Governors. But, in spite of this, America continued faithful, and closely united with the mother country; the dissensions in Europe, the war of the succession, produced no desire to disturb interior tranquillity, or to effect a separation; neither was the glorious war for independence a sufficient motive: they succored us with their treasures; and it has been said, in honor and to the glory of America, that the principle of her revolt had a noble origin, similar to what impelled Spain to defend herself against a hostile irruption. When Andalusia was invaded, in 1810, the greater part of our provinces were occupied by the enemy, our Government dispersed, and our armies nearly annihilated; the destiny of Spain was considered as decided, and her ruin inevitable. It would, indeed, have been difficult to imagine that, from an insulated extremity of the Peninsula, the nation would rise again not only independent, but regenerated and free. The Americans, mistrustful of their chiefs, feared that, being Europeans, they would desire to follow the destiny of Spain, whatever it might be; they, therefore, resolved not to submit to a foreign yoke, and preferred separating from the Peninsula to the indignity of obeying an unjust invader. This was the noble principle of the commotions in America; and, if any of her chiefs had motives less pure, he was obliged to dissemble, and cover them with the pretext of so just a cause.

The Spanish arms, in conjunction with their allies, having beaten and harassed the enemy in every direction, obliged him to evacuate the Peninsula. Such a happy state of affairs announced a speedy reconciliation with the revolted provinces of America; but all the hopes of those who loved their country were dispelled by the fatal decree of the 4th of May, and the execrable system which followed. The war continued to rage in many parts, and the passions, irritated to the highest degree, left but little prospect of a conclusion to such a destructive quarrel. Nevertheless, New Spain, or, more correctly, all Spanish North America, almost entirely quelled at that epoch, put a stop to this devastating warfare. A great part of Peru had constantly remained united to Spain; as also Cuba and the other islands. Thus, while Terra Firma, Buenos Ayres, and Chili, presented the spectacle of Spanish and American blood spilled by the same hands whose interest it was to preserve it, the most important part of Spanish America was free from so much desolation. But this tranquillity does not suffice, though it should extend all over America, and be more durable, it is not sufficient to satisfy the lovers of humanity. America must fix her happiness on a more stable basis, which, instead of prejudicing, may add to that of Europe. The Cortes, soaring above the prejudices of some and the passions of others, must take such wise measures as shall entitle them to be considered worthy rivals of those Cortes who, upon a rock, and under the enemy's cannon, dictated laws at this day respected and obeyed by so many and such distant provinces. The committee, fully persuaded of this, discussed, in various conferences, the questions which appeared to it most proper to produce the great end to which we all aspire; it examined them conjointly with His Majesty's Ministers, who at first entirely concurred with the opinions that were generally adopted. Peculiar circumstances have since obliged them, in some measure, to suspend their judgment, under the impression that public opinion is not yet prepared for a definitive resolution. In this dilemma the committee can propose nothing to the Cortes; because, as it appertains to the Government to decide the question of fact, that is, the convenience and necessity of adopting certain measures, and Government not thinking the moment has yet arrived, the committee must confine itself to excite the zeal of the Ministers, that they may accelerate the wished-for moment. Justice calls aloud for this: the precarious and uncertain destiny of so many Europeans, Spaniards established in those regions; the Americans likewise; the different tribes who have sustained by force of arms the cause of the metropolis; in fine, the true felicity of America and the Peninsula, call aloud for it. The happiness of America consists in a solid peace, guaranty of its future prosperity; that of Spain, in not meeting impediments at every moment, and not having its attention drawn off from its deliberations to make the provisions which such distant provinces require. The knowledge of the century, and an enlightened policy, must guide the Government in so new and glorious a resolution. The committee, possessed with the grandeur of the subject, and convinced that its decision may have some influence in the destiny of the universe, is desirous of communicating to all Spaniards its intimate conviction that they, on their part, may contribute to the happy termination of such an undertaking. Spain would derive advantages that otherwise she will not realize; and the ties of relationship and religion, united to commercial relations, and those which are derived from free institutions, would be the most certain pledge of our harmony and close union. The committee, therefore, not being able of itself to determine on any thing, must confine itself to proposing that the zeal of the Government be excited so that it may present to the deliberations of the Cortes, without delay, the fundamental measures it may think proper, as well for the speedy and complete pacification of the revolted provinces of America, as to secure to them the fruition of a firm and solid felicity.

C.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be three sections of Cortes in America: one in the north, and two in the south. The first shall be composed of the deputies of all New Spain, including the internal provinces of Guatemala: the two other sections shall comprehend—the one, New Granada and the provinces of Terra Firma; the other, Peru, Buenos Ayres, and Chili.

2. These sections shall unite at the time appointed by the Constitution for the ordinary Cortes, governing themselves, in every respect, according to the rules prescribed for these; and they shall have in their territory the same legal representation and powers, excepting the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth, which are reserved for the General Cortes; the part of the seventh relative to approving offensive and defensive treaties; and the second part of the twenty-third.

3. The capitals where these sections shall for the present unite are the following: The section of New Spain in Mexico; that of New Granada and Terra Firma in Santa Fe; and that of Peru, Buenos Ayres, and Chili, in Lima. If the sections, with the consent of the executive power of those countries, should think proper to change the seat of Government, they may select whatever place may appear best suited to their purpose.

4. There shall be in each of these Divisions a delegation, to exercise in the name of the King the executive authority.

5. These delegations shall each be composed of one person, named by the will of His Majesty, selected from amongst men of the most transcendent talents, without excluding the members of the royal family. This delegate shall be removable at the pleasure of His Majesty: he shall be inviolable in regard to the sections of Cortes of those countries, and shall only be responsible for his conduct to His Majesty and the General Cortes. The ministers of this delegation shall be responsible to the respective sections of the Cortes, according to the constitution.

6. There shall be four departments: of the interior, of finance, of justice, of war and marine; some of which may be united, according as it may be judged convenient, in virtue of a law.

7. There shall be three sections of the supreme tribunals of justice, composed of a president, eight ministers, and an attorney general.

8. There shall be three sections of the Council of State, each composed of seven individuals, but the legislative sections may at pleasure reduce their number to five.

9. The commerce between the Peninsula and America shall be considered as interior from one province of the monarchy to another; and, consequently, the Spaniards of both hemispheres shall enjoy in them the same advantages as their respective natives.

10. They shall likewise reciprocally enjoy the same civil rights and equal eligibility to employments and public offices as their respective natives.

11. New Spain and the other countries comprehended in the territory of their legislative section oblige themselves to deliver to the Peninsula the sum of two hundred millions of reals in the space of six years, which shall commence on the 1st of January, 1823, in order to contribute to the payment of the foreign debt, hypothecating the revenue of the State, and the lands that appertain, or may hereafter appertain, to it, in the above-mentioned New Spain and indicated territory.

The said two hundred millions of reals shall be paid by instalments; the first at the commencement of January, 1823, and thus, successively, in six posterior years, until its final liquidation, which will take place on the 1st January, 1828, so that thirty millions may be paid during each of the first four years, and forty during the two last. The term of these instalments may be curtailed, with the approbation of the legislative section that shall be established in New Spain.

12. New Spain and the other territories comprehended in her legislative section likewise bind themselves to contribute to the navy expenses of the Peninsula, with forty millions of reals annually. The payment of this sum shall commence from the time when the legislative section shall first assemble, and shall be delivered at furthest at the expiration of a year from that period: this sum shall be augmented when the circumstances of New Spain shall permit, and delivered, along with the other, specified in the preceding article, in some one of the ports belonging to New Spain in the Gulf of Mexico.

13. The rest of the countries of America comprised in the other sections shall contribute to the Peninsula in the manner that shall be hereafter fixed upon, and according to their circumstances.

14. New Spain takes upon herself the payment of all the public debt contracted in her territory, by order of her agents in her name, and by her authority; the lands, revenues, and other property of the State, of whatever nature, without prejudice to what has been agreed upon in the eleventh article, shall be made over to her, to serve as an hypothecation of what has been stipulated in said article.

15. The deputies of the respective sections, at the time of taking the oath to observe, and cause to be observed, the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, shall add that of complying with and causing this law to be executed.

HOUSE OF THE MARQUIS OF MOSS.

Street of the Infantas, July 9, 1821.

Jose R. Ravenga, one of the Plenipotentiaries of Colombia near His Catholic Majesty, has the honor to present his respects to Thomas Brent, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of North America, and requests that he will be pleased to name an hour at which he can have a personal interview with him.

MADRID, July 9, 1821.

Thomas L. L. Brent, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, kisses the hand of Senor Don Jose R. Ravenga, Plenipotentiary of Colombia, and will be happy to receive him at his house at six o'clock this evening.

Manuel Torres, Agent and Chargé d'Affaires of the Republic of Colombia, in the United States, to John Quincy Adams, Esq., Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 20, 1821.

SIR: The Republics of Venezuela and New Granada, which, after a devastating war of more than ten years, have victoriously achieved the independence which they had declared since the year 1811, were united by virtue of a fundamental law of the Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, of the 17th December, 1819, with the glorious title of the Republic of Colombia, under which it has taken its rank among other independent nations.

In consequence, I have received the order of my Government to communicate to you, sir, this resolution, worthy of Colombia, and to accompany it with the subjoined authenticated copy of the said fundamental law, in order that you may be pleased to lay it before the President of the United States.

I have also the honor to present to you, sir, the credentials of my public character, and a drawing of the national standard, which will henceforth distinguish Colombia among other sovereign and independent States.

Although the foundation of the Republic of these United States would completely justify the right of Colombia, yet, with respect to the custom which has been introduced among nations, the causes which have rendered this measure indispensable have been explained in the declaration of independence of Venezuela, of the 5th of July, 1811, a copy of which Don Telesforo de Orea, then Agent Extraordinary of that Republic, transmitted to your predecessor on the 6th of November of the same year: the other declaration of Venezuela, of the 2d of November, 1818, and the manifesto of the President of the Sovereign Congress of Colombia, of the 26th of August last, copies of which I sent you with my official letter of the 15th of last December, likewise mention them.

The conduct of Colombia being thus in all respects justified, no doubt my Government will be recognised by that of the United States as a free and independent nation, a sister Republic, situated likewise in the same hemisphere. It is also hoped that, to the recognition of the independence of Colombia on the part of the United States, treaties of commerce and navigation will be added, founded upon the bases of reciprocal utility and perfect equality, as the most efficacious means of strengthening and increasing the relations of amity between the two republics.

As you are already acquainted with the solicitude of Colombia, permit me, sir, to add that it is of the greatest importance to my Government to know the determination of the United States in regard to it.

I repeat, sir, the homage of the sentiments of high respect and distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to remain, your most obedient, humble servant,

MANUEL TORRES.

Charge d'Affaires, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Fundamental law of the Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, of the 17th of December, 1819, for the union of the Republics of New Granada and Venezuela, under the title of the Republic of Colombia.

THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

The Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, to whose authority the people of New Granada, lately emancipated by the arms of the republic, have voluntarily submitted, considering—

1. That, by uniting the provinces of Venezuela and New Granada in one republic, they will have the means of attaining the highest degree of power and prosperity;

2. That if they should remain in separate republics, however great the bonds that might unite them, yet, far from benefiting by so many advantages, with difficulty would they consolidate their sovereignty, and cause it to be respected;

3. That these truths, clearly perceived by every man of sound understanding and genuine patriotism, had excited the Governments of both republics to agree to their confederation, which the vicissitudes of war have heretofore prevented;

From these considerations of necessity and reciprocal interest, and in conformity with the report of the select committee of the deputies from New Granada and Venezuela, in the name and under the auspices of the Supreme Being, has decreed, and does decree, the following fundamental law for the republic of Colombia:

ARTICLE 1. The republics of Venezuela and New Granada shall be from the present day united, under the glorious title of the Republic of Colombia.

2. Its territory shall be those comprehended in the former captain generalship of Venezuela, and the viceroyalty of the new kingdom of Granada, embracing an extent of one hundred and fifteen thousand square leagues, whereof the exact boundaries shall be fixed at a more seasonable opportunity.

3. The debts contracted by the two republics, separately, are acknowledged in solidum by this law, as a national debt of Colombia, for the discharge of which the goods and property of the State are pledged, and the most productive of the revenue shall be destined.

4. The executive power of the republic shall be exercised by a President, and, in his absence, by a Vice President, both to be appointed pro tempore by the present Congress.

5. The republic of Colombia shall be divided into three grand departments—Venezuela, Quito, and Cundinamarca, which shall comprehend the provinces of New Granada, whereof the name shall be henceforward suppressed. The capitals of these departments shall be the cities of Caracas, Quito, and Bogota, the addition of Santa Fe being omitted.

6. Each department shall have a superior administration, and chief magistrate, to be appointed for the present by this Congress, with the title of Vice President.

7. A new city, bearing the name of the Liberator, Bolívar, shall be the capital of the republic of Colombia. The plan and site thereof shall be determined by the first General Congress, upon the principle of making it suitable for the conveniences of the three departments, and proportioned to the grandeur for which this rich country is destined by nature.

8. The General Congress of Colombia shall assemble on the 1st day of January, 1821, in the town of Rosario de Cucuta, which, in every respect, is considered the most suitable place. The convocation shall be made by the President of the republic, on the 1st of January, 1820, who shall also communicate the plan for the elections, to be devised by a select committee, and approved by the present Congress.

9. The constitution of the republic of Colombia shall be formed by the General Congress, to whom shall be presented the projet of one already decreed, together with the laws enacted by this Congress, to be immediately carried into execution, by way of experiment.

10. The arms and flag of Colombia shall be decreed by the General Congress. In the mean time, those of Venezuela shall be employed, as they are known.

11. The present Congress shall dissolve on the 15th January, 1820, in order that the new elections may take place for the General Congress of Colombia.

12. A commission of six members, with a president, invested with special powers, to be decreed, shall occupy the place of Congress during its recess.

13. The republic of Colombia shall be solemnly proclaimed to the citizens and the armies with public feasts and rejoicings, to take place in the capital on the 25th December instant, commemorating the nativity of the Saviour of mankind, under whose protection the State has been regenerated by this reunion.

14. The anniversary of this political regeneration shall be perpetually celebrated by a national feast, where virtue and talents, as formerly at Olympia, shall be distinguished and regarded.

The present fundamental law for the republic of Colombia shall be promulgated in the settlements and armies, inserted in the public journals, and deposited in the archives of the cabildos, municipalities, and corporations, whether ecclesiastical or secular.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

ANGOSTURA, 1820.

JUAN GERMAN ROSCIO, Vice President of the Department of Venezuela, and charged with the Government of the Republic, on account of the absence of the President on the campaign, and of the Vice President on commission.

Whereas it is important to the prosperity of Colombia, and to the dignity of that station to which it has been elevated, to establish diplomatic intercourse with other nations, and to make treaties which may confirm its friendship with them, regulate its commerce, and protect mutual interests; and this Government being desirous of drawing more close the relations and bonds of union and good correspondence which already happily exist with that of the United States: Therefore, I have nominated, and, by these presents, do appoint and authorize Manuel Torres, Esq., that, in the rank and with the character of agent and Chargé des Affaires of the republic of Colombia, he present himself and treat with the said United States, and, conformably to the instructions which have been given him, to promote the interests and advantages of Colombia, by reconciling them with those of said States, upon the principles of the most intimate, frank, and sincere friendship.

Given at the palace of Government, at Angostura; signed by my hand, sealed with the provisional seal of the republic, and countersigned by the Secretary of State and Foreign Relations, the 15th of May, 1820.

JUAN G. ROSCIO.

By his Excellency the Vice President of Venezuela, charged with the Government of Colombia.

JOSE R. RAVENGA,
Minister of State and Foreign Relations.

Don Manuel Torres to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, November 30, 1821.

SIR: Since I had the honor of addressing to you my official note of the 20th of February last, requesting of the President of the United States the formal acknowledgment of the independence of the republic of Colombia as a free, sovereign, and independent State, new successes have taken place, which, at the same time that they remove any well-founded obstacle which might at that time have been in the way of the Government of the United States to prevent their acceding to the wish of that republic, render now the said measure more urgent, and I might say indispensable, in consequence of the recent events in Peru and New Spain, and the conduct of the Spanish Government towards America, always unjust, and always capricious.

In compliance with the orders which I have received from the Minister of Foreign Relations, of date the 3d of August, in Cucuta, I hasten to communicate to you, sir, what has occurred in Colombia since the recommencement of hostilities with Spain, and to inform you of the real actual state of the republic, that you may be pleased to lay it before the President of the United States.

In conformity with the fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819, the solemn act of the installation of the General Congress of the republic of Colombia, composed of representatives named by the people of the nineteen free provinces of New Granada and Venezuela, took place on the 6th of May last in the city of Rosario de Cucuta, as is shown by the official document No. 1, which I have the honor to enclose to you.

The General Congress being installed, one of the first measures which called the attention of the legislative body was the great question of the fundamental law; and, after long and elaborate debates, in which each member expressed his opinion with the greatest freedom, the union of New Granada and Venezuela into one body as a nation, under the express agreement of a popular representative Government, divided into legislative, executive, and judicial authorities, was adopted and sanctioned by a plurality of votes; and also the division of the territory of the republic into departments or circles, according to the evidence in No. 2.

The document numbered 3 is the manifesto which, on the 6th of June, the President of Congress addressed to the people and armies of the Condition of Spanish South America.

Republic, notifying them of so important a measure; and No. 4 contains the fundamental law.

Whilst the Congress was engaged with patriotic spirit in discussing and making laws conducive to the correct administration of justice, to the regulation and management of the revenues, and to the promotion of public instruction in all the provinces and places of the State, the attention of the Liberator President was engaged in conducting an active war against the enemy, to expel them entirely from the territory of the Republic. The arms of Colombia experienced once more the aid of a beneficent Providence, and they accomplished, at one blow, the entire destruction of the Spanish power in Venezuela, in the memorable battle of Carabobo, on the 24th of June.

The enemy lost their park of artillery, their baggage, their all, in their very intrenchments; and of more than six thousand men, who were assembled at that military point, scarcely could a small number escape, who were able to retire within the walls of Porto Cabello.

The formidable fortress of Carthagena, and that of Cumana, also fell successively; so that Porto Cabello, in Venezuela, and the isthmus of Panama, in New Granada, are the only two points which the Spaniards for the moment occupy in all the vast territory of Colombia; and probably before the termination of the present year both will be incorporated with the Republic.

Although the isthmus of Panama, from its scanty population, its absolute want of agriculture, and its situation, can contribute little or nothing to the increase or facility of the interior or exterior commerce of the new Republic, still its occupation is of great importance to Colombia, under the view of its own future security and that of the rest of America, and from the great facility which the river Chagres affords for the commerce of Peru, and that of the provinces of New Spain which lie along the Pacific, since the distances, the dangers, and expenses of a navigation by Cape Horn are considerably diminished.

But it was not enough for the Liberator President to annihilate the formidable legions with which the Spaniards oppressed the country; it was also necessary to preserve good understanding and harmony among the inhabitants of Colombia, and to maintain among foreign nations the respect and reputation of the authorities of the Republic which the agents of Ferdinand VII. have constantly defamed, by circulating, through the medium of the press, the most infamous falsehoods against them. He had no other means of realizing his object but exposing to the impartial world the perfidious conduct which the Peninsular Government had incessantly observed towards the Americans; and, to the incontrovertible manner in which he did so, by the proclamation which he addressed to the Spaniards on the 25th of April, from the city of Barinas, is partly due the success of the Republican arms in Colombia and in Peru.

The inhabitants of Colombia, after eleven years of war, as unjust, as cruel, and destructive, guided by the genius of their Liberator President, have achieved the liberty and independence of their country without the least foreign aid; have given themselves a popular and representative Government, and a constitution well calculated to preserve the principles of liberty and equality, and to promote the general prosperity.

With respect to the ability and capacity of Colombia to maintain its independence, no well-founded doubt can arise upon that point, if we consider on one hand the great population of the Republic, which exceeds 3,600,000 souls, the extent of its territory, its natural and artificial resources, and its situation; and, on the other, the great military talent displayed by its generals and officers, and the discipline and valor manifested by its troops on all occasions, but particularly in the celebrated battles of Boyaca and Carabobo, in the capture of St. Martha, defended by seventeen exterior batteries, all taken by assault, and the reduction of the fortresses of Carthagena and Cumana.

Some idea may be also formed of the degree of splendor, power, and future prosperity of the new republic, by considering it placed in the centre of the universe, with an extent of coast of twelve hundred miles on the Atlantic, from the Oronoco to the isthmus of Darien, and of seven hundred miles on the Pacific ocean, from Panama to Bahia de Tumbez, and exempt, at all seasons, from any of those dreadful hurricanes which cause such disasters in the Antilles, in the Gulf of Mexico, and in other places.

The great canals which are formed by the river Oronoco and its tributary streams, the Sulia, with the Lake of Maracaibo, the Magdalena, the Cauca, and the Atrato, which all empty into the Atlantic, render Colombia the most favored part of the universe for interior navigation; and, by a union of all climates, unite also, in great abundance, the productions of the three kingdoms of nature.

Agriculture is further advanced in Colombia than in any other part of continental America, formerly Spanish; and its products of exportation, which consist chiefly of cocoa, coffee, indigo, tobacco of Barinas, and some cotton, are of a quality superior to those of other countries, except the cotton. With respect to the precious metals Colombia is inferior to neither Mexico nor Peru, with the advantage that their discovery is more easy and less expensive. She also unites, by prolonged canals, two oceans which nature had separated; and, by her proximity to the United States and to Europe, appears to have been destined by the author of nature as the centre and the empire of the human family.

Under these auspices it was that the new republic took her rank among other free, sovereign, and independent nations, and that I had the honor, in my note to you, sir, of the 20th February last, to solicit the recognition of her independence on the part of the President of the United States; which request I repeat anew in this.

The glory and the satisfaction of being the first to recognise the independence of a new republic in the South of this continent belongs, in all respects and considerations, to the Government of the United States; and this recognition would be, after all, but a measure which the humanity, the justice, and the convenience and interest of this nation demand.

Reduced as Spain is to an absolute inability to continue the war, her pride wishes an opening, perhaps, to meet with a pretext for making her peace with the Americans, and nothing would better answer her purpose than the recognition of the independence of Colombia by the Federal Government.

On the other hand, if the war between Spain and Colombia must continue, the law of neutrality of the United States would operate with equality with respect to both belligerents, which was not and cannot be the case whilst this Government does not recognise the independence of the new republic. Lastly, between the United States and Colombia there can never exist a competition or rivalry in agriculture, commerce, and navigation, because Colombia has no mercantile navy, nor can she form one for many years, and the products of exportation of her agriculture are entirely different from those which are cultivated in the United States. She wants annually twenty thousand barrels of flour, and other provisions from these States, for which she pays in coffee, indigo, hides in the hair, and in money, according as the intercourse between the two countries is favorable to the agriculture of both.

The political events in Peru and Mexico render the recognition of the independence of Colombia urgent, on account of the great confidence with which this act would inspire those nations to establish popular representative Governments. All South America formerly Spanish is emancipated—that is, upwards of eleven millions of souls; this has given a new importance to the new world, and now they are no more afraid of the machinations of the Holy Alliance to keep America dependant upon Europe, and to prevent the establishment of free Governments.

The present political state of New Spain requires the most earnest attention of the Government of the United States. There has occurred a project, long since formed, to establish a monarchy in Mexico, on purpose to favor the views of the Holy Alliance in the new world. This is a new reason which ought to determine the President of the United States no longer to delay a measure which will naturally establish an American alliance, capable of counteracting the projects of the European Powers, and of protecting our republican institutions. My Government has entire confidence in the prudence of the President, in his disposition to favor the cause of the liberty and of the independence of South America, and his great experience in the management of public business.

Confined for about three months past to my bed or my chamber by a grievous indisposition, which still gives me very few moments of repose, it has not been in my power to address this communication to you sooner.

I have the honor to remain, with the highest respect and distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

Don Manuel Torres to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, December 30, 1821.

SIR: The General Congress of the Republic of Colombia, in the session of the 6th of September, appointed the Liberator and Captain General, Simon Bolivar, President of the State, and General Francisco de Paula Santander, Vice President, for the constitutional term of four years; and on the 3d of October they took possession of their respective magistracies, after having taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution.

The functions of the executive power devolved, from the 10th of said October, on the Vice President of the State, agreeably to the 158th article of the Constitution, in consequence of the Liberator President having taken the command of the armies of the Republic.

The Supreme Government has fixed its residence in the city of Bogota, in virtue of a decree of the General Congress of the 8th of October; and, by another decree of the Liberator President of the 7th, the Senor Pedro Gaul has been appointed Secretary of State and Foreign Relations of the Government of Colombia.

I communicate this to you, sir, that you may be pleased to communicate it to the President of the United States.

I renew to you, sir, the sentiments of respect and distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to remain, &c.

MANUEL TORRES.

Don Manuel Torres to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 2, 1822.

SIR: In the official note which I addressed to you on the 20th of February of the last year, soliciting the recognition of the republic of Colombia on the part of the President of the United States, I represented how important it was to my Government to know the determination of the United States respecting the said demand.

In that which I had the honor to transmit to you, dated the 30th of November last, I repeated the substance of that of the 20th of February, and I suggested some additional powerful reasons which urgently required the positive knowledge of the decision of the President of the United States in regard to a question of so much importance to my Government in the present circumstances, for the regulation of its political and commercial relations with other nations.

I ought not to conceal, sir, my pain in being compelled to distract your attention by requesting once more an answer to my former notes. This course, under all circumstances an indispensable duty of my station, has been rendered the more urgent by the negotiations of peace between Colombia and Spain having lost all their importance in consequence of the Peninsular Government tenaciously persisting in its extravagant and unjust pretensions, at the very time of its most absolute incapacity and impotence to invade the territory of the republic, or to prevent the prosperity which its inhabitants now begin to enjoy—a blessing of the independence which they have gained by their arms, and of the liberty which their Constitution secures to them.

The present state of my health does not yet permit me to visit the capital; but I shall do so as soon as I can undertake the journey without inconvenience.

Be pleased, sir, to accept the homage of the sentiments of esteem and distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

MANUEL TORRES.

The Secretary of State to Don Manuel Torres.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, Jan. 18, 1822.

SIR: In reference to your letters of the 30th of November last and the 2d of this month, I have the honor of informing you that the subject to which they relate is under the consideration of the President of the United States, whose definitive decision concerning it shall, when taken, be forthwith communicated to you. In the mean time, should you receive advices of the surrender of Porto Cabello and the isthmus of Panama, I have to request you would favor me with the information of those events as early as may suit your convenience.

I pray you, sir, to accept, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

To the Secretary of State of the U. States of America.

MEXICO, October 25, 1821.

SIR: The love of my country, the spring of every noble and generous action, induces me to communicate to you, for the information of the President, and for the benefit that may result to the Government and citizens of the United States, the following circumstantial and exact account of the happy revolution that has lately occurred in this kingdom of New Spain, which, by the blessing of God, the intrepidity, talents, and exertions of its patriotic chief, General Don Augustin Iturbide, the enlightened policy of its mother country, and the liberal and philanthropic ideas of its late Captain General, Don Juan O'Donoju, has ended in its complete and entire emancipation.

That you may have a clear and distinct view of the subject, be fully impressed with the justice of the cause of this hitherto afflicted and oppressed people, and have also a general idea of the face of the country, its inhabitants, productions, &c., it may not be improper to state that, since its conquest, (which, if my memory serves me, was in the year 1521,) it has been governed by sixty-two viceroys, and innumerable commandant generals, governors, and superintendents of provinces, who, according to general tradition, have been, with very few exceptions, as many merciless and mercenary tyrants, the rapacity and unfeeling barbarity of whom nothing could have withstood for such a length of time but a land enriched by the bountiful hand of nature to a most extraordinary degree, and a people born and brought up, until of late, in all the intolerance of superstition and ignorance, and accustomed from their earliest infancy to the innumerable, and I may say almost incredible impositions of both Church and State.

Few foreigners have, perhaps, had an opportunity of seeing as much of the kingdom as myself, having travelled on horseback from the port of Guaymas, on the Gulf of California, to almost every part of Sonora, and afterwards through the provinces and superintendencies of New Biscay, New Galicia, San Luis Potosi, Queretaro, and Mexico, to this city, a distance at least of seven hundred leagues, passing through all the principal cities, visiting the most celebrated mines, and conversing familiarly with all classes of people.

The provinces of Puebla, Mexico, Mechoacan, San Luis Potosi, and Guanajuato, may be termed the central ones, and, of those I have seen, the best watered, most fertile, most productive, and most inhabited; those that border on the Gulf of Mexico are Merida de Yucatan, Oaxaca, Vera Cruz, New Santandero, and Texas; the second, from all accounts, beautiful in the extreme; and the third and last very fertile, but almost entirely uncultivated: those on the Pacific ocean and Gulf of California, New Galicia, Sinaloa, and Sonora, fertile in parts, but very scant of water; and the extensive internal ones of New Leon, New Biscay, and New Mexico, that reach to the latitude of forty-two degrees north, which have for the most part the same defect, and which may be called a general one throughout the kingdom, there being in most parts but little rain, and in no part, excepting Texas, what we would call rivers. Where there is an abundance of water, however, the country is wonderfully fertile, producing in many parts two or three crops a year, and yielding each time four and five hundred for one, with the singular advantage of a diversity of temperature within very short distances, produced by the greater or less elevation of the lands, the centre of the kingdom being from eight to twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea; so that it is not uncommon to see in the same market all the fruits, grains, and other productions of temperate, hot, and cold climates, as is the case in this, and most of the principal cities.

Before the insurrection of the year 1810, the kingdom contained six millions of inhabitants; and it is worthy of remark, that Providence has been no less lavish in the distribution of her gifts as respects mankind, than in the fertility and production of the earth; the natives of this country, not excepting even the Indians, being endowed with a quickness of perception and ability to acquire and make themselves masters of the arts and sciences that is very notable, and far exceeds that of the inhabitants of Old Spain, and perhaps many other countries. At the abovementioned period, the kingdom may be said to have been at its acme of prosperity; the royal revenue exceeding $20,000,000, and the money coined at the Mint of this city upwards of $28,000,000 annually; it has, however, ever since been on the decline, in consequence of the devastations committed by both parties in the long and cruel war carried on between the Europeans and Americans, so that the population cannot now be computed at more than four millions, the revenue at more than half of what it was, and the money coined yearly at from 5,000,000 to $8,000,000; this year it will probably not exceed $4,000,000.

I have been informed that a very correct history of this insurrection, up to the unfortunate expedition of General Mina, has been written by a Mr. Robinson, and published in Philadelphia; it is useless, therefore, to say more on the subject than that its commencement was undoubtedly caused by the abuses daily committed in all branches of the Government in this kingdom, by the disorder in which Spain was thrown in consequence of the invasion of the French, and by the imprudent measures adopted in this city, one of which was the arrest of the Viceroy Iturigaray, and many of its principal American inhabitants. It is also worthy of remark that, in proportion as it was prolonged, the evils increased, and its symptoms became more malignant; the various incidents of the struggle, imbruing its character with blood, produced other passions, and among them those of rancor and hatred, which, irritated and inflamed by the inconsideration, imprudence, and want of policy on both sides, divided the kingdom into two parties, the Europeans and Americans, whose respective opinions formed essentially the war that destroyed both.

Among those that contributed most to quell the insurrection was the before-mentioned General Don Augustin Iturbide, then colonel of the regiment of Celaya, and native of the city of Valladolid, in the province of Mechoacan. Born of European parents, and animated by a mistaken zeal, he was induced to embrace the royal cause, and, with a fervor and impetuosity peculiar to his character, committed many arbitrary and violent acts, that in a great degree tarnished what would otherwise have been deemed brilliant achievements, and over which it is necessary to draw a veil, his subsequent conduct having entirely effaced them from the memory even of those most aggrieved. Indeed, it would appear that a sense of the injustice he had committed, an innate conviction of the impropriety of adhering to the party he had espoused, and a remorse of conscience, were the principal causes of the change in his political sentiments; for we see him all at once assuming a different character, and at a moment when his sovereign had heaped upon him innumerable honors.

The impossibility of re-establishing peace and quietness in the kingdom by the force of arms was fully ascertained during the Viceroyalty of the Captain Generals Venegas and Calleja, of whom it may be said that they rather dispersed than conquered the Americans, the country being in a complete state of revolt, and full of chieftains that commanded from three to six hundred, and even a thousand men each, and bands of robbers that infested the highways in September, 1816, when the Viceroy Apodaca arrived. To this disinterested, good, and virtuous man is due the pacification of the kingdom; his penetration, skill, and humanity having suggested to him the propriety of laying aside the arms that had hitherto been in use, and of winning the affections of the people by means of persuasion, pardons, and premiums, who, without general officers, money, or any immediate expectation of establishing the liberty of their country, and weary of the wandering and wretched life they had so long endured, embraced readily the opportunity that presented of returning to the bosoms of their families. No sooner was the plan adopted than its wisdom became palpable; entire towns and districts yielding to the solicitations of the agents appointed by the Government for carrying it into execution, so that at the end of two years all was tranquillity, and you could travel in every direction without escort of arms, except that of Acapulco, between which and this city the chieftains Guerrero, Asensio, and a Colonel Bradburn, of Virginia, that came with General Mina, with about fifteen hundred men, had taken refuge, and fortified an almost inaccessible mountain, from whence they made predatory excursions. To reduce these to obedience was the ultimate object and wish of the Government; and, with this view, General Iturbide was invested with the important military command of the department of the South, that contained about three thousand veteran troops, and had its headquarters in the town of Iguala, distant about thirty leagues from this city, on the direct road to Acapulco. It is proper to mention here that, a few months previous to his nomination, news had been received of the regeneration of Old Spain, and of the establishment of the Constitution in that country—a circumstance that created great alarm in this among the clergy and friars; the lower class of people were also taught to believe that the planting of it here would be attended with the entire destruction of their long-established form of religion.

The Viceroy, (Apodaca,) who was now graced with the title of "Conde del Venadito," was also opposed to the new system, and discovered so much reluctance in the change of his measures, that his unwillingness and tardy mode of proceeding became evident to all, and gave occasion to many just and violent complaints that were made by its admirers, who publicly accused him of its infraction; while the American writers, taking advantage of the liberty of the press, and the confused and unsettled state of public opinion, called aloud for independence as the only certain remedy for the numerous evils that surrounded them.

The crisis was too important and obvious to escape the penetration of our hero, Iturbide, who was also instigated to an immediate execution of the plan he had, in consequence, formed, of liberating his country forever from its thralldom, by the mutiny of several of the officers of the regiment of the "four military orders," that had before given many unequivocal proofs of disaffection and insubordination, which was supposed to extend to the soldiers of that corps, and by the departure of a convoy for Acapulco with near a million of dollars, that was intended to be embarked in a ship bound to Manilla, that he resolved on detaining.

Condition of Spanish South America.

He immediately, therefore, concerted his measures with the clergy and friars, and, with the specious pretext of upholding them in their privileges and immunities, secured their favor and protection. He also communicated his design to such of the Governors of the provinces as he thought likely to aid him in the execution of it, and, on his arrival in Iguala, persuaded a great part of the troops under his command to join him in the undertaking, in the belief that the Government secretly favored it—a circumstance that they at first readily gave credit to, from their knowledge of the anti-constitutional sentiments of its leading members, but in which they were soon after undeceived, and, in consequence, not more than a thousand remained faithful of those that espoused his party. The design was also made known to Guerrero, Asensio, and Bradburn, who pledged themselves to support him in the enterprise; and, thus prepared, he openly declared the independence of the kingdom, swearing it in the most solemn manner at the head of his army, in the said town of Iguala, on the 24th day of February last, seizing, at the same time, and appropriating to the use of the nation, the treasure destined for the Manilla ship.

His next step was to form a plan for the installation of the new Government, (a copy of which I enclose,) and to give to his army the style and title of the "army of the three guarantees," from the protection it was to afford to the Catholic religion, to the independence of the kingdom, and to the indissoluble union between the Europeans and Americans. A copy of the plan was immediately sent by him to the Viceroy, with a letter, stating all that had passed, explaining his motives for having formed and adopted the new system; inviting him and the Government to aid and assist in its establishment; and, finally, naming the said Viceroy, the "Conde de Cortina," and the president of the royal audience, the members that were to compose the regency, reserving to himself the command that he had assumed of the National Army.

The Viceroy, had he been left to himself, would, I believe, have assented to the proposal, from the vehement desire he has ever manifested to avoid the effusion of blood, and the miseries concomitant to a renewal of the war, as well as from a conviction that the plan and policy adopted by Iturbide could not fail to gain him innumerable friends, and to enable him, finally, to accomplish his views. It was necessary, however, to call to his counsel the members of the various tribunals of which the Government was composed, as well as the principal military officers, all of whom, counting on the versatility that had been conspicuous in the American character up to that period, resolved, unanimously, to maintain the then existing Government, in the belief that the few troops that had adhered to Iturbide would leave him the instant the royal army should approach Iguala.

The old favorite system of blood and murder was also upheld; but to this the Viceroy would not consent, and an amnesty was offered to all, not excepting Iturbide. The Field Marshal Linan was named commander-in-chief, and a numerous staff and army was committed to his charge. He was, however, so slow in his motions, that a detachment of troops sent by Iturbide had taken possession of the town and castle of Acapulco, and he himself, and the remainder, were on their march in the direction of Valladolid before the army of Linan moved from its cantonment in the neighborhood of this city.

The cry of independence was no sooner raised in Iguala than it spread in all parts, and an army was formed in the Provinces of Puebla and Vera Cruz, by the Colonels Herrera, Bravo, and Santa Ana, that took possession of the cities of Orizaba, Cordova, and Xalapa; which was the most important conquest, the two former being the depots of the Government tobacco, of which a prodigious quantity fell into the hands of the Independents, with a large sum in specie—circumstances that were attended with the double advantage of being a powerful succor to them, and an irreparable loss to the Government, which counted on the remission to, and sale of, the tobacco in Mexico as its principal means of supporting the war.

In this state of things, it was resolved to divide the Government army into three divisions: one of which, under the command of Colonel Margues, was to retake Acapulco; another, commanded by Colonel Hebia, to march against the cities of Orizaba, Cordova, and Xalapa; and the third to return for the defence of this capital, on the supposition that Iturbide might suddenly change his route, and take the city by surprise. It, however, soon appeared that his intention was very different, and that his object was to pass Valladolid, and unite with a Colonel Bustamante, of San Luis Potosi, who had risen at this critical period, and proceeded against the city of Guanajuato with a considerable part of his regiment of dragoons, declaring independence in all the cities and towns in the Bajío, the inhabitants of which received him with open arms. On arriving at Guanajuato, it also surrendered to him; and, as he was joined by the garrisons of the several places he passed through, Iturbide, on meeting him, found himself at the head of an army of five thousand men, including the divisions of Colonel Barragan and Major Parres, that left Valladolid with what troops they could seduce, as soon as they knew of his intention to pass that way. With this respectable force it was determined to attack that city, which was the best fortified of any in the kingdom, and had a garrison of seventeen hundred men. It however made no defence, and its commandant, Colonel Quintanar, and all but about six hundred of the troops, went over to Iturbide.

At Guanajuato, where is one of the richest minerals in the kingdom, a mint was established, that proved afterwards very serviceable to the Independents, and injurious to the royal party; the silver from all the neighboring mines taking the direction of that city instead of Mexico.

Acapulco remained but a short time in possession of the Independents, the castle having capitulated before the arrival of the division of Colonel Margues to two Spanish frigates that accidentally arrived there from Panama. San Juan del Rio, a fortified town between this city and Queretaro, was next invested; the siege, however, lasted but a few days; the greater part of the garrison, being Americans, deserted, and joined the Independents, obliging the few that remained to capitulate.

The division of Colonel Hebia that had marched, as before stated, against the cities of Orizaba, Cordova, and Xalapa, surprised Colonel Bravo, with about fifteen hundred Independents, in the town of Tepeaca, about nine leagues from Puebla, who, unprepared for action, retired with his troops to a large convent of the order of San Francisco, that was constructed by Hernando Cortez, soon after the conquest, in the form of a fortress, to serve as a place of refuge for him and his followers in the event of any sudden emergency. Hebia had with him his own regiment of "Castile," and other European troops, that equalled in number those of Bravo. A field-piece was, however, necessary to make a breach in the wall of the convent, and, to obtain this, he sent immediately to Puebla, asking, at the same time, for a reinforcement of five hundred men, that the success of the action might be placed beyond all doubt. Bravo, suspecting his intention, resolved on a sortie, with the determination to cut his way and escape, as Iturbide had given positive orders to all his officers to avoid the effusion of blood, and to act solely on the defensive, from the double motive of conciliating the enemy and avoiding the butchery of his countrymen; sensible where one European should be killed, four or five Americans would fall, the number of the latter in the King's service exceeding greatly that of the former. In the first and second attempts he made, he was unsuccessful; the third, however, proved more fortunate, and he got off with the loss of fifty or sixty men, killing as many of those that were opposed to him.

This was the first action that had occurred, and the result proved highly important to the Independent cause; the gallant conduct of their troops inspiring a universal confidence, animating their companions in arms throughout the kingdom to a singular and unexpected degree, and demonstrating to the political and military officers of the Government of Mexico that they had to contend with a brave and determined enemy.

Disappointed and chagrined at the result of the action, and undeceived as to the sort of troops he had to deal with, Hebia proceeded on his march to Cordova, where he was killed in the first assault, and his army obliged to retire from the siege by Colonel Herrera, and the valiant troops that defended the city. While these scenes of glory were achieving in the provinces of Puebla and Vera Cruz, the siege of the city of Queretaro, one of the most beautiful in the kingdom, and the third in rank as respects size, opulence, and commerce, was pushed with much vigor by Iturbide in person. Its garrison was composed of nine hundred Europeans, draughted from various regiments, and about six hundred Americans, all under the command of Brigadier General Loaces, a native of the kingdom of Peru, colonel of the regiment of Saragossa, and a brave and experienced officer. He had determined to make a vigorous and desperate defence; and, as the fate of the kingdom depended in a great measure on that of this city, the Government resolved to abandon that of San Luis Potosi, and to succor Queretaro with the European regiment of Zamora that was stationed there. The order to this effect was no sooner despatched than Iturbide knew of it, and concerted measures to surprise the troops on their march, which were so well executed that they found themselves surrounded when they least expected it by a body of three times their number, and compelled to surrender at discretion. This happy occurrence for the Independents was a deathblow to the Government, who found itself at once deprived of the important capital and province of San Luis Potosi, that were immediately occupied by the Independents, and without the means of contributing to the relief of Queretaro, which capitulated shortly after; the American part of the garrison joining Iturbide, as usual, and the Europeans going on parole to Celaya, until such time as they could be transported to the Havana. These troops, to their eternal disgrace, proposed afterwards to their colonel to rise and march to Mexico; but he, like a man of honor, sent the letter to Iturbide, who immediately ordered them to be disarmed and dispersed.

The next action of any importance was in the neighborhood of Toluca, fourteen leagues from the city, between the regiment of Fernando VII., commanded by Colonel Castillo, and a body of the Independents of an equal number, under the orders of Colonel Filisola, which was indecisive, both parties claiming the victory, after an obstinate battle, in which more than two hundred were left dead on the field, and the Independents in possession of two cannon, that their opponents were obliged to abandon.

At this period, General Negrete, commander of the troops in the province of Guadalajara, rose with the whole of his army, obliged the commandant, General Don Jose de la Cruz, to fly from the capital of that name, where, and in all other parts of the province, independence was sworn; the commerce of the port of San Blas was also declared free to all nations. Cruz took the road leading to the internal provinces, with the intention, it was said, of uniting with Brigadier Don Joaquin Arredondo, commandant general of the eastern provinces, of raising an army in union with him, and of returning, either to reconquer his own province, or to the aid of that of Mexico. Arredondo had, however, already caused independence to be sworn throughout his district, and, on hearing this, Cruz made a halt in the city of Zacatecas, but, being pursued by Negrete, fled to Durango, the capital of the province of New Biscay, carrying with him a large sum in specie that he found in the treasury at Zacatecas, which city soon after surrendered to a detachment that was sent against it by the commandant of San Luis Potosi.

On the death of Hebia, the command of the regiment of Castile devolved on Lieutenant Colonel Luna, who, on the fall of Queretaro, was ordered to return to Mexico by forced marches, in the expectation that Iturbide would now attack the capital. Similar orders were also sent to Colonel Margues, in whose division was a principal part of the insubordinate regiment of the "four military orders." The male inhabitants of Mexico, from the age of sixteen to fifty, were also ordered to enrol themselves in the militia, without exception or distinction of persons, and every possible precaution was taken to prevent a surprise and maintain the city until such time as an answer should be received to despatches that had been sent to Spain, or troops should arrive that were expected from the Havana.

All this, however, was not sufficient to allay the rancor that a certain part of the community had conceived against the Viceroy, nor to convince them of his upright intentions, or extinguish the sparks of insubordination I have already hinted at in some of the European troops, which, from the first, was more immediately directed at his person than at the Government. A report was, therefore, industriously circulated that he was in secret correspondence with Iturbide, and that there was no real intention to defend the city, notwithstanding the preparations that were ostensibly making for its protection; the whole a prelude to the scandalous revolution of the 5th of July, which had for its object the arrest of that most excellent man, and, without doubt, was accomplished by dint of money paid by the merchants to the officers that took part in the affray, who had the temerity to secure the persons of their colonels and other principal military men opposed to their project, to assault the palace and make a prisoner of the Viceroy, and afterwards the audacity to place against its gates and the corners of the principal streets, for the information of the public, who were so many witnesses of their atrocity, a paper setting forth that he had of his own accord, and at the respectful petition of the officers of the European regiments, delivered the political and military command of the kingdom to Field Marshal Don Francisco Novella, the person they had pitched upon as the leader of the faction.

This gentleman had under his command the various corps of artillery and engineers that existed in the kingdom; and as his education and occupation until now had been altogether confined to that line, you will readily imagine him entirely unfit for the discharge of the arduous and complicated duties of Viceroy of these extensive provinces.

Indeed, he himself was sensible of his incompetency, and very prudently declined the offer; as unsuitable, however, as he was, there was no other person they could avail themselves of that was less so, and the same necessity that compelled them to name him obliged him to accept the appointment. From a Government constituted by the insubordination of a few soldiers that had the vanity to compare their iniquitous conduct with the noble enthusiasm of the Spanish nation, which, tired of obeying tyrants that abused the goodness of their monarch, rose in a mass to recover the rights of which they had unjustly been deprived, no good was to be expected; and we see it employed from its very commencement in destroying the constitutional regimen, of which it did not leave a vestige, and in substituting the most arbitrary and tyrannical system that it is possible to imagine; all of which was fomented and sanctioned by a body that Novella had created, with the denomination of the "Junta Consultiva," composed of a few individuals who had contributed with their money to place the power in his hands, were furious at seeing approach the expiration of their authority, and with sentiments diametrically opposed to the system of liberality and philanthropy at present predominant.

At the time these scenes of horror were transacting in the capital, and to which I myself had like to have been a victim, notwithstanding the great prudence I observed in my department, a bloody occurrence took place in Vera Cruz in consequence of the storming of that city by a party of troops commanded by an inconsiderate but brave young officer named Santa Ana, who scaled the walls and got complete possession of the town, but was afterwards obliged to retire with great loss, his soldiers having abandoned their arms with a view to plunder, and the inhabitants setting upon them when in that defenceless state.

The city of Puebla de los Angeles, the largest in the kingdom except Mexico, next attracted the attention of General Iturbide, in front of which was a large army of Independents composed of the divisions of the Conde de la Cadena, Herrera, Bravo, Filisola, and others, that only awaited the orders of their General to make the attack, and to prevent which, and the loss of many valuable lives, he went in person, preferring, in all cases, the plan he had from the first adopted of reducing his enemies by means of persuasion and negotiation rather than by force of arms. The fate of Puebla was all-important to the Government in the critical situation in which it found itself, being one of the chain of fortified towns that connect Mexico with Vera Cruz, to which port it had resolved to retire with the European part of the army and inhabitants, in the event of not being able to sustain itself in the capital. Puebla was, therefore, well garrisoned, served with an excellent park of artillery, and defended with many cannon of a large calibre, so that its commander-in-chief, Brigadier Don Ciriaco Llano, the Marquis de Vivanco, and other experienced officers stationed there, had, until the last, sanguine hopes of being able to defend it. Iturbide, however, called to his assistance a part of the army he had left in Queretaro, and surrounded the city with so many troops that resistance would have been nothing short of an act of madness; it therefore capitulated.

On the surrender of Puebla, the army of Iturbide, which had now augmented to the number of about eighteen thousand, and which was composed entirely of veteran troops that had been disciplined in the King's service, and had gone over to him clandestinely, or joined him on the fall of the various cities he had conquered, received orders to march in separate columns to different towns in the neighborhood of Mexico, with the intention of manifesting to the Government of that city the folly of any further resistance. It was, however, entirely in vain that the General had adopted this prudent measure; in vain that one or two praiseworthy citizens had ventured to reason on the subject with Senor Novella; and in vain that he was assured he could not rely on more than one-third part of the troops that composed the garrison. War! war! was the cry of him and his Junta Consultiva, and the motto they wore on their hats, and that worn by all their officers and troops, was, "Vivir y morir fieles y utiles."

Iturbide, after having rested a few days in Puebla, and partaken of the effusion of gratitude manifested towards him by the good people of that city, was on the point of leaving it, with the intention of fixing his headquarters near the town of Chalco, and directing from thence the attack that was to have been made on Mexico, when he received a letter from Lieutenant General Don Juan O'Donoju, who had recently arrived at Vera Cruz, informing him that he had been named by the King of Spain Captain General and political chief of the Kingdom, and had accepted the appointment at the solicitation of his friends, the representatives of America in the Cortes of Spain; that he had risked his health and life, and sacrificed his convenience, at a period when he intended to retire from the public service, without any other desire than that of acquiring the love and esteem of the people of New Spain, and without other sentiments than those of tranquillizing the disastrous inquietude that reigned in the kingdom—not by consolidating or perpetuating the despotism that existed, or prolonging the colonial dependence, or falling into the errors or imitating the defects of many of his predecessors in supporting a system of government, the tyranny and injustice of which arose from the barbarity of the age in which it was established, but by reforming the ideas of the misled, calming the passions of the exasperated, and pointing out to the people generally the mode of obtaining with security, and without the horrible sacrifice they were making, the happiness which the illustration of the era in which they lived had induced them to seek after, and which no rational person could disapprove. He also required Iturbide to appoint a place at which they could have an interview, and realize the sincere and ardent desire he had to prevent the evils and misfortunes inseparable to a state of hostility, until such time as the treaty they might conclude, founded on the basis of the plan published in Iguala, should be ratified by the King and Cortes.

What a blow was this to the existing Government of Mexico, and to those that preceded it since the year 1810! what a contrast to their iniquitous and shameful mode of proceeding! The wise and beneficent O'Donoju, reading the public papers of the Independents, applauding the enterprise of their hero Iturbide, confirming his ideas, commending his virtues, and desiring his friendship, as he does in the conclusion of his letter; while the intrusive Novella and his Junta Consultiva, in imitation of their barbarous predecessors, Vanegas and Calleja, were persecuting with unrelenting fury, and almost to death itself, those that communicated with the Independents, or in whose possession should be found any of their seditious writings; proscribing the chiefs of the revolution, and heaping upon them every species of reproach and ignominy!

But the scene had changed; the star of liberty that rose in our own country had happily spread its influence in the more Eastern and Western hemispheres, and displayed to the world the criminal conduct of the Caligulas and Neros that had for such a length of time dishonored Spain and abused human nature.

This letter of O'Donoju, with another that he wrote to Senor Novella, was sent by Iturbide to the Mexican Government, accompanied with a proposal for the suspension of arms until such times as the definitive treaty should be signed in Cordova, the city named by Iturbide as the point of conference. Novella would, however, hear nothing of the sort, and the letters were declared spurious, notwithstanding that Senor Alcocer, a venerable curate of this city, who had been intimately acquainted with O'Donoju in Spain, proved to the Junta the identity of the signatures, by showing others that he had in his possession; which contumacy on the part of Novella exasperated Iturbide so much that he set off for Cordova, leaving orders with his Generals for the immediate occupation of the towns of Tacuba, Tacubaya, Azcapuzalco, and Guadalupe, neither of which was distant more than half a league from Mexico, and all of them in possession of the European troops.

This was an unexpected circumstance to Novella and the Junta, who had the folly and vanity to suppose they could frighten the Independents from the execution of their plan by means of the silly proclamations they almost daily issued, in which they affected to despise their number, challenged them openly to commence the attack, and declared the Generals Luaces and Llano traitors to their King and country for having surrendered the cities of Queretaro and Puebla. The heroes of Tepeaca, Cordova, and Toluca were, however, not so easily scared, and a column of fifteen hundred men sent by Colonel Bustamante against Azcapuzalco presented to the inhabitants of Mexico the sight of a most bloody and desperate action that took place between them and an equal number of the regiments of Castile and military orders that composed the garrison of Azcapuzalco, the result of which was at least six hundred killed and wounded, and the abandonment of the town by the Europeans. A few days after, an attempt was made to dislodge the Europeans that were stationed in Guadalupe, by means of cannon placed on a neighboring hill; and while this operation was carrying on by a part of the Independents, and others were taking possession of Tacuba and Tacubaya, from both of which towns the Europeans had retired, an aid-de-camp arrived with a copy of the treaty of Cordova, concluded between General O'Donoju and Iturbide, and an order from the former to Sr. Novella, commanding him to obey him as Captain General of the kingdom, to cause him to be recognised as such by the troops, to cease all hostilities from the instant he should receive the order, and to adopt measures for the evacuation of the city. This peremptory mandate on one side, and near approach of the Independents on the other, placed Novella, the Junta, and their European troops in an awkward predicament; inasmuch as, if they obeyed the order, they would be subject to arrest and trial for the scandalous imprisonment of the late Viceroy; and if they refused compliance, to be treated as rebels against the King's authority; their object, therefore, was to shelter themselves from the punishment they had justly deserved in the best manner they could. And, with this view, although they were perfectly convinced of the presence of O'Donoju in the kingdom, and of the reality of the treaty signed in Cordova, they nevertheless affected to doubt the truth of one and the other, alleging that all might be a stratagem of Iturbide; and on this frivolous pretext refused to evacuate the city. On the deposition of the Conde del Venadito, the Junta Provincial Ayuntamiento, and other bodies corporate, hesitated to acknowledge the authority of Novella, but were obliged to do so eventually, from the fear of the bayonets he had at his command.

Now, however, that they were surrounded by the Independents, and backed by O'Donoju, they openly protested against his proceedings, and, in consequence, he was obliged to ask for an armistice, and compelled to send one of the Junta Consultiva to Puebla to ascertain, as he said, the identity of the Captain General. This envoy, who had hitherto been one of the most strenuous supporters of the measures of Novella, and one of the most active members of the Junta, received such a fright from the lecture O'Donoju gave him, that he immediately returned, explained fully to Novella all that had passed, and forever afterwards ceased to meddle in the matters at issue. Novella was also inclined to succumb, and would have renounced his employ, had it not been for fear of the troops; he having lost all authority, and they having usurped the command, so the city was in the utmost anarchy and confusion, and dreading at every instant a general massacre and pillage, with which it had been threatened daily for near a month, and which would most assuredly have succeeded had it not been for the proximity and number of the Independent army, that cut off all possibility of escape for the European troops, whose idea was to commit all sorts of enormity, rob what they could, and take the road for Vera Cruz.

Things had got to that pass that it was impossible to confide in a servant, and dangerous to do so in a friend; every thing like social intercourse was at an end; those that could with any sort of convenience leave the city, fled: and those that were obliged to remain, sought security in their houses; so that, in this once populous metropolis, there was scarce a soul to be seen. In this state of things, the Generals O'Donoju and Iturbide arrived at Tacubaya, and the former had an interview with Sr. Novella, in the course of which he gave him to understand the impropriety of his conduct in resisting the legitimate authority as long as he did, the impossibility of defending the city, and the certainty of the massacre of the Europeans, should it be taken by assault; remonstrated with him respecting the insubordination of the troops, pointed out to him the illegality of their conduct, and enjoined him to prevent the effusion of blood, by exercising the little influence he had with the subaltern officers and soldiers, in the understanding that he would not take upon him to scrutinize their conduct in the arrest of the late Viceroy, but leave them to exculpate themselves in the best way they could on arriving in Spain. The following day news was received of the surrender of the city of Durango and General Cruz to General Negrete, after an obstinate resistance, in the course of which many lives were lost, and the declaration of independence in the western internal provinces, under the command of Field Marshal Alexo Garcia Conde; so that if the soldiers of Novella had before any hope, it now entirely disappeared, and, in order to avoid a disgraceful capitulation, were obliged to acknowledge the supremacy of General O'Donoju, obey his orders by evacuating the city, and march to that of Toluca, there to wait until it was convenient for them to embark.

To complete the independence of the kingdom, there was now wanting the declaration of the province of Merida de Yucatan, which followed almost immediately the surrender of Acapulco, the castle of Perote, and Vera Cruz; the two former of which capitulated soon after, and the latter has, without doubt, ere this followed their example, advice having been received yesterday by the Government that it was on the eve of surrendering. The province of Guatemala, which has always been a separate Viceroyalty from that of Mexico, was also sensible of the general impulse, and desirous of becoming an integral part of the Mexican empire, has likewise sworn independence, which, without doubt, will extend to its neighboring provinces, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Veragua, so that we may from this instant consider North America, with the exception of Canada, as divided into two grand and important commonwealths, that may, with the aid of those that are forming in South America, be able, in the course of time, to give the law to the opposite continent.

I am very far from believing myself possessed of the qualities necessary to treat with the energy and exactness that it merits a subject of the importance of that on which I have ventured to write, and certainly should not have had the temerity to have touched upon it, had it not been for the particular situation in which I found myself, an eye-witness of all that passed, and from the conviction I have ever been under, that each individual is bound to contribute towards the good of his country to the utmost of his ability, be it great or small. With this view, therefore, I shall, now that I have finished my narrative, take the liberty to add a few remarks, and to say, in the first place, that the revolution which I have attempted to describe is not one of those that have been accomplished by means of unbridled passions, cruelty, rancor, or revenge; but, on the contrary, has, from its commencement, been accompanied with brotherly love, patriotism, disinterestedness, truth, and good faith; so that the more I reflect on its origin and progress, the more is my admiration excited, and the more am I tempted to exclaim that America has produced two of the greatest heroes that ever existed—Washington and Iturbide. Secondly, that the new Government is established on a sure and solid foundation, the people being highly delighted with it, and the subordinate chiefs, officers, and soldiers having one and all implicitly followed the example of moderation set them by their magnanimous leader, who, to obviate strife, envy, and emulation, has absolutely refused the crown, and insisted that the Emperor shall come from Spain, as he first proposed in the town of Iguala. Indeed, the plan there published has been adhered to with the most religious scrupulosity, except the slight variations made in it by the Treaty of Cordova, at the suggestion of General O'Donoju; and the empire is, in consequence, now governed by a regency of five of its most distinguished and enlightened statesmen, who have elected General Iturbide, President, and appointed him commander-in-chief of the land and sea forces, and by a convention of thirty-six of the principal personages in the empire, as respects, talents, rank, and riches. The independence is to be sworn in this city on the 27th instant, and the Cortes are to meet on the 24th of February next, the anniversary of the declaration in Iguala. In the mean time, the convention will be employed in enacting the most salutary decrees; and among those already passed is one declaring the commerce of this empire free to all nations; another, doing away all the arbitrary taxes, impositions, and excises imposed by the former Government; a third, reducing the duties from sixteen to six per cent.; a fourth, for the encouragement of the miners, relinquishing to them the quota of silver formerly paid to the King, with other imposts that amounted to seventeen per cent.: so that many poor minerals that could not be worked before, can now be used to advantage; and a fifth, recognising and making the new Government responsible for the debt contracted by the old one, of thirty-six millions of dollars.

That there is a strong bias in the minds of the people of this country in favor of the Government and citizens of the United States in preference to all other nations, is beyond a doubt; and that the convention, of which four-fifths are native Americans, and the Regency, which is composed entirely of them, are actuated with the same sentiments, is also certain. On this subject I have had various conferences with the leading members of the Administration, whose sentiments will be fully explained to you shortly by Don Juan Manuel de Elizalda, the Minister Plenipotentiary that is already named, and now preparing to go to Washington, where I have no doubt he will be received and acknowledged as the representative of a free and independent nation; the Mexican empire being so at this time to all intents and purposes, in the first place, by the unanimous wish and consent, power and authority, of its inhabitants; and, secondly, by the treaty signed at Cordova, between the Generals O'Donoju and Iturbide, the deputed agents of Spain and this empire.

Your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES SMITH WILCOCKS.

Treaties concluded in the city of Cordova, on the 24th instant, between the Senors D. Juan O'Donoju, Lieutenant General of the armies of Spain, and D. Augustin de Iturbide, First Chief of the Imperial Mexican Army of the Three Guarantees.

The independence of New upon Old Spain being declared, and it having an army capable of supporting this declaration, the provinces of the Kingdom being subdued by it, the capital, where the legitimate authority had been deposited, being besieged, and when there only remained for the European Government the fortresses of Vera Cruz and Acapulco, dismantled and without the means of resisting a siege well directed and which would last some time, Lieutenant General D. Juan O'Donoju arrived at the first port with the character and authority of Captain General and superior political chief of this Kingdom, appointed by His Catholic Majesty, who, being desirous of avoiding the evils which afflict the people in vicissitudes of this sort, and trying to conciliate the interests of both Spains, invited the first chief of the imperial army, D. Augustin de Iturbide, to an interview, in which they might discuss the great business of the independence, by loosening without breaking the chains which united the two continents. The interview took place in the city of Cordova, on the 24th of August, 1821; and the first with the authority of his character, and the latter with that of the Mexican empire, after having conferred at length on what was most proper for both nations, considering the present situation and the last occurrences, agreed upon the following articles, which they signed by duplicates, to give them all the force of which documents of this sort are capable, each one keeping an original in his possession for the greater security and validity:

1. This America shall be recognised as a sovereign and independent nation, and shall in future be called the Mexican Empire.
2. The Government of the empire shall be a constitutional limited monarchy.
3. There shall be named, to reign in the Mexican empire, (after the oath which the fourth article of the plan points out,) in the first place, the Senor D. Ferdinand VII., Catholic King of Spain, and, upon his renunciation or non-admission, his brother, the Most Serene Senor Infant D. Carlos; upon his renunciation or non-admission, the Most Serene Senor Infant D. Francisco de Paula; upon his renunciation or non-admission, the Most Serene Senor D. Carlos Luis, Infant of Spain, formerly heir of Etruria, now of Lucca; and upon his renunciation or non-admission, he whom the Cortes of the empire shall designate.

4. The Emperor shall fix his Court in Mexico, which shall be the capital of the empire.

5. Two commissioners shall be appointed by his Excellency General O'Donoju, who shall go to the Court of Spain to place in the royal hands of Senor D. Ferdinand VII. a copy of this treaty, and the exposition which shall accompany it, for the service of His Majesty first, while the Cortes of the empire offer him the crown, with all the formalities and guarantees which a business of so much importance demands; and entreat His Majesty that, in the case of the third article, he deign to notify their Serene Highnesses the Infants, mentioned in same article, in the order in which they are named; interposing his benign influence that one of those personages designated from his august house may come to this empire, inasmuch as the prosperity of both nations is concerned in it; and for the satisfaction which the Mexicans will receive in adding this to the other bonds of friendship with which Spaniards can and desire to be united.

6. There shall be immediately appointed, according to the spirit of the plan of Iguala, a Junta composed of the first men of the empire for their virtues, for their stations, for their fortunes, authority, and judgment, of those who are designated by the general opinion, the number of whom may be very considerable, that the union of lights may insure the success of their determinations, which are emanations of the authority and powers which the following articles grant them.

7. The Junta, of which the following article treats, shall be named the Provisional Junta of Government.

8. Lieutenant General D. Juan O'Donoju shall be one of the Provisional Junta of Government, in consideration of the convenience of a person of his rank taking an active and immediate part in the Government, and from its being indispensable to admit some of those who were designated in the said plan, in conformity with its very spirit.

9. The Provisional Junta of Government shall have a President appointed by itself, and whose election shall take place in one of its own members or not, who shall have an absolute plurality of votes; and if an election does not take effect at the first voting, they shall proceed to a second scrutiny, beginning with the two who may have together most votes.

10. The first step of the Provisional Junta of Government shall be, to publish its installation, and the motives which unite it, with the explanations which it may consider proper, to illustrate to the people their interests, and the mode of proceeding in the election of deputies to the Cortes, of which mention shall be made hereafter.

11. The Provisional Junta of Government shall appoint, after the election of its President, a Regency, composed of three persons, either of its own members or otherwise, in which shall be vested the executive power, and which shall govern in the name of the monarch, until he shall take the sceptre of the empire.

12. The Provisional Junta, being installed, shall govern provisionally according to the existing laws, in every thing not opposed to the plan of Iguala, and until the Cortes form the constitution of the State.

13. The Regency, immediately after being appointed, shall proceed to the convocation of the Cortes, agreeably to the method which the Provisional Junta of Government may determine, in conformity to the spirit of the twenty-fourth article of the said plan.

14. The executive power is vested in the Regency, the legislative in the Cortes; but as it has happened for some time before that they were united, that both may not again fall under one authority, the Junta shall exercise the legislative power, first in the cases which may occur, and which cannot await the meeting of the Cortes; and then shall proceed in accordance with the Regency: secondly, to serve as an auxiliary and consultive body to the Regency in its determinations.

15. Every person who belongs to a society, the system of government being changed, or the country passing into the power of another prince, remains in the state of natural liberty to transport himself, with his fortune, to what place he pleases, without there being any right to deprive him of this liberty, (unless he shall have contracted some debt with the society to which he belonged, by crime, or in other ways known to publicists,) in this case Europeans are admitted into New Spain, and the Americans resident in the Peninsula; consequently, they shall be free to remain, adopting this or that country; or to demand their passports, which cannot be refused to them, for removing from the realm in the time prefixed, bringing or carrying with them their families and effects, but satisfying, at the departure of the last, the established duties of exportation, or which may hereafter be established by competent authority.

16. The former alternative shall not have place with respect to public officers or military men who are notoriously disaffected to the independence of Mexico; but these shall of necessity quit this empire within the term which the Regency may prescribe, carrying away their property, and paying the duties mentioned in the preceding article.

17. The occupation of the capital by the troops of the Peninsula being an obstacle to the realizing of this treaty, it becomes indispensable to overcome it; but, as the first chief of the imperial army, uniting his sentiments to those of the Mexican nation, is desirous not to take it by force, because there are abundant resources, notwithstanding the valor and constancy of the said Peninsular troops, for the want of means and ability to support themselves against the system adopted by the whole nation, Don Juan O'Donoju offers to use his authority that the said troops may complete their departure without the effusion of blood, and

By order of the Regency of the Empire, I communicate this to you for your information.

MEXICO, November 15, 1821.

Manifesto of the Provisional Board of Government to the People of the Empire.

After the long night of three ages in which America has lain plunged in darkness, the aurora of her felicity at last burst forth; that day dawned for which she had sighed, and which she desires may be perpetual. This consummation would never have been obtained if it had not been founded in justice, or if justice herself were not to be the base of the Government which is to consolidate it. But the Junta has the satisfaction to announce that both considerations are combined in the emancipation which we have accomplished.

Nature has marked out the territories of nations by rivers, mountains, and other boundaries, which establish their limits. How many States are divided by the Po and the Rhine, as the Alps and the Pyrenees divide France from Italy and from Spain. From this last, immense seas and a vast distance divide America—distances which not only make them different as kingdoms, but establish them as belonging to two different worlds. Policy must necessarily conform to the order of nature; and as it would be monstrous to put in the same space the contrary elements of fire and water, it is equally so to unite in one province people who are distinct and distant, especially if that difference and distance extend to the extremity of the two worlds. Since, then, it embraces all the contrarieties which climate can originate, two vast globes and opposite movements cannot revolve without embarrassment upon one axis, but each requires its own. In the same manner, two empires of distinct and opposite qualities require two Governments, without being susceptible of being united in one, which is never sufficient to govern both well.

If occasionally, the order of nature is violated, in departing from the boundaries she fixes, it must happen, as with fire enclosed in the mines, that an explosion will finally take place. The two Spains, Old and New, or, which is the same thing, Castile and Mexico, which have hitherto borne those names, belong to distinct regions of the earth, to different portions of the globe, to opposite zones of the sphere—differences which at once evince the justice of their separation. If they have been united, as Esau and Jacob in the womb of Rebecca, and have long remained so, this alone, giving to the latter her growth, has rendered it necessary that they should separate, as these twins did, first in the maternal bosom, and afterwards in their descendants.

The growth of nations constitutes, successively, their youth and virility—ages which demand their separation. It is very natural that when a nation has arrived at these ages, she should refuse to depend upon one whose assistance she no longer needs, in order to act for herself. If even among brutes, the teats of the dam are forsaken by the offspring, which has now become capable of receiving other aliment than milk; if the chick whose wings have grown flies alone, and no longer suffers itself to be conducted by the bird which formerly transported it; if the pubescent virgin consents to the nuptials which compel her to abandon the paternal dwelling, in order to form a new family; is it not just that America, having acquired the strength which justifies it, should emancipate herself?

It has been long since she arrived at her youth; but it has also been long since assent was refused to her emancipation; for, before that was accomplished, she had attained the age of virility, which justifies it still more. The qualifications which demonstrate that age are to be found in her, both the moral ones of refinement and intelligence, and the physical ones of arms and population. The increase of their families alone prevented Abraham and Lot from dwelling in common, and they took different routes in order to live separate.

Why, then, deny to America the justice which may assist her in emancipating herself, supposing this to be her situation and circumstances? Must she not listen to the voice of nature, which speaks to her even through her insensible organs? May she not burst, like the plant, the teguments which covered her when young? Must she be forever in pupillage, though at the age of puberty? and must she remain a child of the family even when she is both able and willing to shake off the paternal authority? But even this is not all: nature tells her still more, especially through the organ of reason.

Whenever the bird can force the door of its cage, or any other animal break the ligaments which confine it, they do not hesitate a moment in doing so, for reason teaches them to seek their own happiness. This is what justifies still more the independence of America. She has been able to burst her fetters in order to acquire her liberty, and to escape from the yoke which impeded her prosperity, and placed her labor, industry, commerce, and all her movements, within such bounds and restraints as might enfeeble them, in order to make preponderant the importance of the mother country, or rather in order that the sole and absolute power might be vested in the latter. Between the power and performance in this case, and with respect to such high and interesting objects as are dictated by nature and demonstrated by reason, there ought to be no space whatever, for they immediately touch each other.

The Provisional Board of Government, installed for these purposes, in consequence of their attainment and the occupation of the capital, has no other view than them. It has been assembled in order to found, perfect, and perpetuate them. The fundamental principles of government which they have adopted appertain to the first; the mode of procedure upon which they have resolved to the second; the ties and ligaments which they have proposed to themselves to the third; and they expose it all to the people, in order that they may judge of the sincerity and propriety of their intentions and conduct.

The foundations should correspond to the edifice, and are what give it its principal strength. The principles of government which have been adopted conformably to the plan of Iguala and the treaty of Cordova are those received by the most illustrious nations. A representative in preference to an absolute government, a limited monarchy, and a constitutional system with which we are already acquainted, are the fundamental maxims, the angular stone of our edifice. There is nothing to apprehend from the ideas opposed to these, nor from those which will not bear the light of day. Those which animate us are purely liberal. Until the meeting of the Cortes, the Spanish constitution and laws will be observed, so far as they are not inapplicable to the peculiar situation of the country.

The plan of operations or mode of proceeding of the Junta has been to appoint a Regency to exercise the executive power, reserving to itself the legislative power for such purposes as cannot be delayed until the meeting of the Cortes, to whom this branch of the Government appertains. Had the Junta assumed this power in its whole extent, it would have usurped it from the people; but if it were not to exercise it provisionally in cases of urgency, the Government would remain defective; the necessities of the moment could not be provided for, nor the thousand junctures which may present themselves be met.

To obviate both the one and the other, they have already prescribed to themselves a rule not to sanction any thing, even provisionally, unless its nature is such that it will not admit of being delayed until the meeting of the Cortes, to whom every thing else is referred. The wisdom of their measures, which involves the perfection of the liberty and happiness of the people, depends upon the choice which they may make of proper representatives. The province of this board is to inform them on the subject, in order that, all passions being laid aside, and intrigue and party spirit banished, they may have no other end in view than the welfare of the country. For this the Junta is now laboring, and to take such measures that the Congress may be assembled in as short time as possible.

In the mean time, the public debt, so called, has been acknowledged, and ordered to be paid as soon as affairs are in a condition to do so; at the same time, a stop has been put to the arbitrary contributions with which the inhabitants were oppressed without any advantage to the treasury. The first fact is announced for the satisfaction of the creditors, the second for that of the public, and both as an evidence of the proceedings of the Government. Would it were possible for the latter to pay another debt much greater, and of a superior kind, of which it confesses itself a debtor. Such is that of the deserving army, which, animated by the purest patriotism, and braving dangers and difficulties at the expense of inexpressible sacrifices, have consummated the arduous undertaking which Heaven was pleased to protect and crown with success. But there is no tongue to express what it deserves, no hand to remunerate its services. Who is there competent to relate what all and each of its individuals have performed—the actions which have signalized many of the soldiers and chiefs, especially the first, who animated the rest? What reward can we give them, or what can recompense their benefits? as Tobias the youth demanded of his father, speaking of his benefactor. We have no other choice, inasmuch as reward is impossible, but to manifest to them our gratitude; to which end many steps have been taken, and others will continue to be taken.

Finally, the bonds which the Junta has proposed to itself, in order to insure and prolong our independence, are, besides the union of the inhabitants of the empire, which constitutes one of the guarantees, an alliance, federation, and commerce with other nations. The Spanish nation, to whom we owe our origin, and to whom we are attached by the closest ties, ought to be the first and most privileged in our consideration. We do not content ourselves with the mere family connexion which results from calling one of their princes of the royal blood to our empire. We aspire to more; we desire to unite ourselves in a fraternity which may turn to the advantage of the whole nation, and let it know that our political independence, to which we have been compelled by the causes set forth, does not loosen the bonds which unite us, nor cool our affections, which ought to be the more sincere, in order to destroy all resentment.

We desire, then, that our fraternity may be made known to the whole world; that European Spaniards, in virtue of that title alone, may domiciliate themselves in our country, subjecting themselves to its laws, and under the inspection of our Government; that our ports may be opened to them for the purposes of trade in such a manner as may be arranged by our laws, and that a preference may be given to them as far as possible above other nations; that there may be established between them and us, if practicable and agreeable to them, a good reciprocal understanding, regulated by definitive treaties; and that in every thing there may appear the most cordial amity. With regard to foreign nations, we shall preserve harmony with all, commercial relations and others, as may be expedient.

The Junta congratulates itself that the people of the Empire will perceive, in what has been set forth, at least their wishes for a successful result, which they expect from the patriotism and intelligence of the inhabitants, who may suggest to it whatever they deem conducive to a better government, which the Junta will hold in due consideration.

MEXICO, Oct. 13, 1821.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, agreeably to their resolution of yesterday, a report from the Secretary of

Condition of Spanish South America.

State, with copies of the papers requested by that resolution, in relation to the recognition of the South American provinces.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 26, 1822.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 25, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the Senate of this day, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate any information he may have, proper to be disclosed, from our Minister at Madrid, or from the Spanish Minister resident in this country, concerning the views of Spain relative to the recognition of the independence of the South American colonies, and of the dictamen of the Spanish Cortes, has the honor to submit to the President copies of the papers particularly referred to.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, March 9, 1822.

SIR: In the National Intelligencer of this day, I have seen the Message sent by the President to the House of Representatives, in which he proposes the recognition by the United States of the insurgent Governments of Spanish America. How great my surprise was, may be easily judged by any one acquainted with the conduct of Spain towards this Republic, and who knows the immense sacrifices which she has made to preserve her friendship. In fact, who could think that, in return for the cession of her most important provinces in this hemisphere; for the forgetting of the plunder of her commerce by American citizens; for the privileges granted to their navy; and for as great proofs of friendship as one nation can give another, this Executive would propose that the insurrection of the ultramarine possessions of Spain should be recognised? And, moreover, will not his astonishment be augmented to see that this Power is desirous to give the destructive example of sanctioning the rebellion of provinces which have received no offence from the mother country to those whom she has granted a participation of a free constitution, and to whom she has extended all the rights and prerogatives of Spanish citizens? In vain will a parallel be attempted to be drawn between the emancipation of this Republic and that which the Spanish rebels attempt; and history is sufficient to prove that, if a harassed and persecuted province has a right to break its chains, others, loaded with benefits, elevated to the high rank of freemen, ought only to bless and embrace more closely the protecting country which has bestowed such favors upon them.

But even admitting that morality ought to yield to policy: what is the present state of Spanish America, and what are its Governments, to entitle them to recognition? Buenos Ayres is sunk in the most complete anarchy, and each day sees new despots produced, who disappear the next. Peru, conquered by a rebel army, has near the gates of its capital another Spanish army, aided by part of the inhabitants. In Chili, an individual suppresses the sentiments of the inhabitants, and his violence presages a sudden change. On the coast of Firma, also, the Spanish banners wave, and the insurgent Generals are occupied in quarrelling with their own compatriots, who prefer taking the part of a free Power to that of being the slave of an adventurer. In Mexico, too, there is no Government; and the result of the questions which the chiefs commanding there have put to Spain is not known. Where, then, are those Governments which ought to be recognised? where the pledges of their stability? where the proof that those provinces will not return to a union with Spain, when so many of their inhabitants desire it? and, in fine, where the right of the United States to sanction and declare legitimate a rebellion without cause, and the event of which is not even decided?

I do not think it necessary to prove that, if the state of Spanish America were such as it is represented in the Message; that if the existence of its Governments were certain and established; that if the impossibility of its reunion with Spain were so indisputable; and that if the justice of its recognition were so evident, the Powers of Europe, interested in gaining the friendship of countries so important for their commerce, would have been negligent in fulfilling it. But, seeing how distant the prospect is of even this result, and faithful to the ties which unite them with Spain, they await the issue of the contest, and abstain from doing a gratuitous injury to a friendly Government, the advantages of which are doubtful, and the odium certain. Such will be that which Spain will receive from the United States, in case the recognition proposed in the Message should take effect; and posterity will be no less liable to wonder that the Power which has received the most proofs of the friendship of Spain should be the one delighted with being the first to take a step which could have only been expected from another that had been injured.

Although I could enlarge upon this disagreeable subject, I think it useless to do so, because the sentiments which the Message ought to excite in the breast of every Spaniard can be no secret to you. Those which the King of Spain will experience at receiving a notification so unexpected will be doubtless very disagreeable; and at the same time that I hasten to communicate it to His Majesty, I think it my duty to protest, as I do solemnly protest, against the recognition of the Governments mentioned, of the insurgent Spanish provinces of America, by the United States, declaring that it can in no way now, or at any time, lessen or invalidate in the least the right of Spain to the said provinces, or to employ whatever means may be in her power to reunite them to the rest of her dominions.

I pray you, sir, to be pleased to lay this protest before the President, and I flatter myself that convinced of the solid reasons which have dictated it, he will suspend the measure which he has proposed to Congress, and that he will give to His Catholic Majesty this proof of his friendship and of his justice.

Condition of Spanish South America.

I remain, with the most distinguished consideration, praying God to guard your life many years, your most obedient humble servant,

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

JOHN Q. ADAMS, Sec. of State.

The Secretary of State to the Minister from Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 6, 1822.

SIR: Your letter of the 9th of March was, immediately after I had the honor of receiving it, laid before the President of the United States, by whom it has been deliberately considered, and by whose direction I am, in replying to it, to assure you of the earnestness and sincerity with which this Government desires to entertain and to cultivate the most friendly relations with that of Spain.

This disposition has been manifested not only by the uniform course of the United States in their direct political and commercial intercourse with Spain, but by the friendly interest which they have felt in the welfare of the Spanish nation, and by the cordial sympathy with which they have witnessed their spirit and energy exerted in maintaining their independence of all foreign control and their right of self-government.

In every question relating to the independence of a nation, two principles are involved: one of right, and the other of fact; the former exclusively depending upon the determination of the nation itself, and the latter resulting from the successful execution of that determination. This right has been recently exercised, as well by the Spanish nation in Europe, as by several of those countries in the American hemisphere which had for two or three centuries been connected as colonies with Spain. In the conflicts which have attended these revolutions, the United States have carefully abstained from taking any part respecting the right of the nations concerned in them to maintain or newly organize their own political constitutions, and observing, wherever it was a contest by arms, the most impartial neutrality. But the civil war in which Spain was for some years involved with the inhabitants of her colonies in America has, in substance, ceased to exist. Treaties equivalent to an acknowledgment of independence have been concluded by the commanders and viceroys of Spain herself with the republic of Colombia, with Mexico, and with Peru; while, in the provinces of La Plata and in Chili, no Spanish force has for several years existed to dispute the independence which the inhabitants of those countries had declared.

Under these circumstances, the Government of the United States, far from consulting the dictates of a policy questionable in its morality, has yielded to an obligation of duty of the highest order, by recognising as independent states nations which, after deliberately asserting their right to that character, had maintained and established it against all the resistance which had been or could be brought to oppose it. This recognition is neither intended to invalidate any right of Spain, nor to affect the employment of any means which she may yet be disposed or enabled to use, with the view of reuniting those provinces to the rest of her dominions. It is the mere acknowledgment of existing facts, with the view to the regular establishment with the nations newly formed of those relations, political and commercial, which it is the moral obligation of civilized and christian nations to entertain reciprocally with one another.

It will not be necessary to discuss with you a detail of facts upon which your information appears to be materially different from that which has been communicated to this Government, and is of public notoriety, nor the propriety of the denominations which you have attributed to the inhabitants of the South American provinces. It is not doubted that other and more correct views of the whole subject will very shortly be taken by your Government, and that it, as well as the other European Governments, will show that deference to the example of the United States which you urge it as the duty or the policy of the United States to show to theirs. The effect of the example of one independent nation upon the councils and measures of another can be just only so far as it is voluntary; and as the United States desire that their example should be followed, so it is their intention to follow that of others upon no other principle. They confidently rely that the time is at hand when all the Governments of Europe friendly to Spain, and Spain herself, will not only concur in the acknowledgment of the independence of the American nations, but in the sentiment that nothing will tend more effectually to the welfare and happiness of Spain than the universal concurrence in that recognition.

I pray you, sir, to receive the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don J. DE ANDUAGA, Envoy, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, April 11, 1822.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note of the 6th instant, in which you were pleased to inform me that this Government has recognised the independence of the insurgent provinces of Spanish America. I despatched immediately to Spain one of the secretaries of this legation to carry to His Catholic Majesty news as important as unexpected; and, until I receive his royal orders upon the subject, I have only to refer to my protest of the 9th of March last, still insisting upon its contents as if its substance were repeated in the present note.

With the greatest respect, I renew the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated MADRID, February 14, 1822.

I have the honor to enclose to you a hurried translation of the last dictamen of the commission of the Cortes on the affairs of Spanish America, and the determinations made by that body.

Dictamen of the commission to whom it was referred to report on the state of the provinces of Ultramar, presented February 12, 1822.

The commission has meditated maturely and circumspectly on the proposition of the Minister of Ultramar, and, after having heard him, has considered the diverse circumstances in which the provinces of both Americas are at present, and may be found hereafter; the fruitlessness and inefficacy of the commissions that have been directed to the Government established in them; and, possessed with the noble desire that the same may not again, with the waste of public treasure, and the sacrifice of humanity, occur, is of opinion that the Cortes ought not to lose time in considering the proposition of the Ministry, since it will be a consequence of the results; and, in order to obtain them, the Government, and the commissioners it elects, ought to be authorized to hear and to transmit to the legislative power every class of propositions, be they what they may; at the same time it judges that the national decorum, and the protection which in justice is due to the European and American Spaniards, call for the establishment of a basis useful and conducive to the welfare of the Spains.

Before fixing this basis, and that it may be as productive to the common felicity as policy and the national honor require, the commission lays down the fixed principle that this new, grand, and legitimate path for the pacific communications being opened, all treaties be esteemed of no value or efficacy that have been formed between Spanish chiefs and American Governments, which ought to be understood as null, as they have been from their origin, as respects the acknowledgment of independence, inasmuch as they were not authorized, nor could such authority be given them, unless by previous declaration of the Cortes.

The commissioners may hear all the propositions that may be made to them in order to transmit them to the metropolis, excepting such as take away or limit in any manner the absolute right of the European and American Spaniards, residing in whatever part of the ultramarine provinces, to remove and dispose of their persons, families, and property, as they may think proper, without being opposed by any obstacle or measure that might prove injurious to their fortunes. With this explanation, the commission reproduces its anterior dictamen; the Cortes will resolve what may be most proper.

Espiga,	Oliver,
Cuesta,	Murphy,
Alvares Escuden,	Navarette,
Toreno,	Paul.
Moscoso,

The particular vote of the Senor Oliver proposes to add the following clause to the dictamen:

"That it ought to be understood as not affecting the responsibility which persons, whoever they may be, may have incurred in this affair, nor the rights of the Spanish nation represented by the Cortes and the King."

The particular vote of the Senors Moscoso, Torreno, and Espiga, proposes the following additions to the dictamen:

"1. That the Cortes declare that the treaty called that of Cordova, celebrated between General O'Donoju and the chief of the dissidents in New Spain, Don Augustin Iturbide, as well as any other act or stipulation relative to the recognition of Mexican independence by that General, are illegitimate, and null in their effects as to the Spanish Government and its subjects."

"2. That the Spanish Government, by a declaration to all others with which it has friendly relations, make known to them that the Spanish nation will regard, at any epoch, as a violation of the treaties, the recognition, either partial or absolute, of the independence of the Spanish provinces of Ultramar, so long as the dissensions which exist between some of them and the metropolis are not terminated, with whatever else may serve to convince foreign Governments that Spain has not yet renounced any of the rights belonging to it in those countries."

"3. That the Government be recommended to take all possible measures, without any delay, to preserve and reinforce those points of the provinces of Ultramar that remain united to the metropolis, obedient to its authority, or that resist the separation from it by the dissidents; proposing to the Cortes the resources it requires, and are not at its disposal."

"4. That the Cortes declare that the provinces of Ultramar that have declared their independence of the metropolis, or do not acknowledge de facto the supremacy of the Government of it, ought not to have deputies in the Cortes during their continuance in this state."

The additional vote of Senors Murphy, Navarette, and Paul, to the anterior dictamen, states that it is their opinion that, in case of the approbation by the Cortes of the dictamen of the commission, they should not approve the additional votes presented by some individuals of it, as being contrary to the ends proposed by the same commission, but should put in execution the measures included in the dictamen without delay, without prejudice to what the ordinary Cortes may opportunely resolve upon, whatever else they may esteem convenient.

After a short discussion, whether the dictamen should be discussed by itself, or with the additional votes, it was determined that the dictamen of the commission should be first discussed. During the discussion, propositions to the following effect were presented by the Senor Solanot, viz:

"That the Cortes, with a generosity peculiar to the constitutional system by which we are governed, and for the general interest of the Spaniards of both worlds, declare the independence of all those provinces of both Americas that actually are so at this day, on condition that each one of those Governments pay an annual subsidy in recompense of the rights which are renounced; that a treaty of commerce be formed on the basis most convenient to the reciprocal interests of the American and Peninsular Spaniards; that all hostilities be completely suspended until this treaty be completely approved; that all the Spaniards who may wish to retire to the Peninsula may do so freely, with all the funds belonging to them, without being obliged to pay any duty whatever; that any Spaniard who wishes to live in America shall have preserved to him the enjoyment of all his rights and property; that every Spaniard who may have been deprived of his property and of his rights, in consequence of the anterior disturbances, shall be reinstated in them; that all the wealth and property belonging to European Spain shall remain at its disposal, and be removed to the Peninsula at the expense of America; that all the troops that are actually in America, belonging to European Spain, shall be maintained in the same points at the cost of the American Government, until the ratification of this treaty; that European Spain may dispose of the naval force it has in America; and that there be established a confederation composed of the American Governments, under the protection of European Spain, upon the basis that may be most convenient, and guarantied as may be accorded."

Senor Munoz Torrero demanded that the author of those propositions should withdraw them immediately, as he had no powers to authorize his making them, or, if he had, to exhibit them. The Cortes accorded that these propositions should be withdrawn, as contrary to the power given to them by the Constitution.

After considerable discussion, the Cortes approved of the dictamen as proposed by the commission.

On the following day the particular votes were discussed, and decided as follows:

That of Senor Oliver was not admitted to a vote.

That of Senors Moscoso, Espiga, and Toreno, the three first articles approved, and the fourth withdrawn by its author.

[Communicated to the House, April 17, 1822.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th of February last, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House whether any foreign Government has made claim to any part of the territory of the United States upon the coast of the Pacific ocean, north of the forty-second degree of latitude, and to what extent; whether any regulations have been made by foreign Powers affecting the trade on that coast, and how far it affects the interests of this republic; and whether any communications have been made to this Government by foreign Powers touching the contemplated occupation of Columbia river," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, containing the information embraced by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 15, 1822.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 13, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th of February last, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House whether any foreign Government has made claim to any part of the territory of the United States upon the coast of the Pacific ocean north of the forty-second degree of latitude, and to what extent; whether any regulations have been made by foreign Powers affecting the trade on that coast, and how far it affects the interests of this republic; and whether any communications have been made to this Government by foreign Powers touching the contemplated occupation of Columbia river," has the honor of submitting to the President sundry papers, containing the information embraced by the resolution.

At the time when the subject of the proposed occupation of the Columbia river was presented to the consideration of Congress, at their last session, the Minister of Great Britain, at two several interviews with the Secretary of State, suggested that Great Britain had claims on the Northwest coast of America, with which he conceived that such occupation on the part of the United States would conflict; and requested to be informed what were the intentions of the Government of the United States in this respect. The Secretary of State declined answering those inquiries, or discussing those claims, otherwise than in writing. But no written communication upon the subject has been received.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT of the U. S.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Baker, Chargé d'Affaires from Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 18, 1815.

SIR: It is represented that an expedition which has been sent by your Government against a post of the United States, established on Columbia river, had succeeded in taking possession of it. By the first article of the Treaty of Peace, it is stipulated that all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, shall be restored without delay, with the exception only of the islands in Passamaquoddy bay, which should remain in the possession of the party in whose occupation they then were, subject to the decision provided for in the fourth article. As the post on Columbia river was taken during the war, and is not within the exception stipulated, the United States are of course entitled to its restitution; measures, therefore, will be taken to reoccupy it without delay. It is probable that your Government may have given orders for its restitution; to prevent, however, any difficulty on the subject, I have to request that you will have the goodness to furnish me with a letter to the British commander there to that effect.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

A. ST. JOHN BAKER, Esq.

Mr. Baker, Chargé d'Affaires from Great Britain, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 23, 1815.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 18th instant, acquainting me that it had been represented to the American Government that a British force, sent for that purpose, had succeeded in taking possession of the United States establishment on Columbia river, and claiming its restoration under the words of the first article of the treaty, upon the ground of its having been captured during the war; stating, likewise, that His Majesty's Government may have given order for its restitution, but requesting, with a view to prevent any difficulty on the subject, that I would furnish a letter to that effect to the British commander there.

As I have received no communication from His Majesty's Government on the subject of these orders, you will readily, I am convinced, perceive the impracticability of my furnishing a letter of this nature; and although it is believed that the post in question has been captured, of which, however, the American Government does not appear to have any certain information on which to ground the claim of restitution, yet another point, equally essential, remains in great uncertainty, viz: whether any persons whatsoever were left to retain possession of it. My impression is, that the establishment was broken up, and the persons found there brought away. Vice Admiral Dixon, however, the commander-in-chief of His Majesty's naval forces on the Brazil station, in whose command the Pacific ocean is included, is no doubt in possession of every necessary information in relation to this post, and will be able to communicate on the subject with any authorized agent on the part of the United States.

Having observed that you have stated, in two letters which I have lately had the honor of receiving from you, that I had been particularly charged with the execution of the Treaty of Peace, I avail myself of this opportunity of noticing the circumstance, simply with a view of preventing any possible misapprehension which might be produced by it. You will perceive, on a reference to the two credentials empowering me to exchange the ratifications, and to act as His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, that no such particular authority was vested in me, although the general powers of the above character would undoubtedly enable me to promote, and in some respects accomplish, this object.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. ST. JOHN BAKER.

Mr. Bagot, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26, 1817.

SIR: From the conversation which you did me the honor to hold with me two days ago, upon the occasion of the inquiry which I thought it my duty to make relative to the reported destination of the United States sloop-of-war Ontario, I am, I presume, warranted in inferring that the information which I had previously received upon that subject is essentially correct, and that one of the objects of the voyage of the Ontario is to establish a settlement in the neighborhood of the Columbia river, on the Northwest coast of America.

It will be remembered that, some months after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace, an application was made to Mr. Baker, then His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in this country, claiming the restitution of a post which had been held by the United States upon the Columbia river, and which was alleged to have been captured during the war; and Mr. Baker was requested to take steps for the purpose of facilitating its restoration.

Mr. Baker having, in his reply, pointed out the insufficiency of the evidence on which the claim of restitution appeared to be founded, and having represented his want of authentic information and instructions upon the subject, referred the Secretary of State to the British Admiral, within whose command he conceived the Pacific ocean to be included.

In consequence of this correspondence, an application was soon afterwards made by Mr. Baker to the Governor General of Canada, in the expectation that he, perhaps, might be enabled to furnish some information upon the subject, in the event of the question being again brought into discussion.

From the reports then made by him, it appeared that the post in question had not been captured during the late war, but that the Americans had retired from it, under an agreement made with the Northwest Company, who had purchased their effects, and who had ever since retained peaceable possession of the coast.

As it thus appears that no claim for the restitution of this post can be grounded upon the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and as the territory itself was early taken possession of in His Majesty's name, and has been since considered as forming a part of His Majesty's dominions, I have to request that you will do me the honor to furnish me with such explanation as you may judge proper of the object of the voyage of the Ontario, so far as it may relate to establishments upon the territory to which I refer, in order that I may represent to His Majesty's Government, in its just point of view, a measure in which His Majesty's rights and interests appear to be so materially involved.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, February 14, 1818.

I am now to have the honor of stating all that passed in the conversation with Lord Castlereagh on the 1st of this month.

His lordship introduced in the last place (assuaging as much as possible, by his manner, the essential character of his remarks) the affair of the establishment at the mouth of the river Columbia. A despatch from Mr. Bagot, he observed, had acquainted the Government here with the steps lately taken by the Government of the United States to repossess itself of that post; and he had to express to me the regret which had been felt at the measure. It was to have been wished, he intimated, that, before the Ontario sailed, notice had been given to the British Minister at Washington of the intention to despatch her, with a communication of the objects of her destination; Great Britain having a claim of dominion over the territory in question. He went on to inform me that Mr. Bagot had sent in a remonstrance upon the occasion, to which, at the last dates, an answer had not been returned. His lordship closed by saying that it was the desire of this Government to submit to the Government of the United States a proposal that the claim of title to this post should, as in the former instances, go before commissioners, and be governed, in other respects, by the precedent of the treaty, annexing to it a third supplemental article as the groundwork of an eventual arbitration.

To his propositions and remarks I made such replies as the nature of all, and the novelty of some of them, appeared to demand. First, as to the settlement at Columbia river: Having heard nothing from the Department upon the subject, I was necessarily uninformed of what passed at Washington. I could only treat it as my first impressions dictated. I expressed the surprise which I felt at its assuming an aspect of complaint. The just grounds upon which England claimed dominion were, I said, unknown to me. Granting that there did exist in her favor any claim or pretence of right, was it possible that the lawfulness of the step taken could be drawn into question? That the spot was in our possession before the war, was a fact known to the world; that it fell, by belligerent capture, into the hands of Britain, whilst it raged, was alike notorious. How, then, under a treaty which stipulated the mutual restitution of all places reduced by the arms of either party, was our right to immediate and full repossession to be, for an instant, impugned? I advert to the familiar case of Nootka Sound and the Falkland Islands. Here Great Britain, under circumstances far less strong, had asserted the undeniable principle of which we had claimed the benefit. In fine, I know not how to illustrate or justify, by argument, a measure which seemed to rest upon so broad and indisputable a foundation of national right. It is proper, at this stage, to say that Lord Castlereagh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title. The manner of obtaining it he said was alone to be lamented, declaring that it arose from the possible tendency which it might have to give some momentary disturbance in that region to the general harmony subsisting between the countries. He hoped sincerely this would not be the case, and added that, with a view to forestall, by the most prompt and practicable means, such a result, he had addressed a note to the Lords of the Admiralty, and another to Lord Bathurst, Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, on the 26th of last month, desiring that the proper orders might be expedited to prevent, under whatever form, all hostile collision. A copy of these notes he took down and read to me.

I proceeded with further remarks. Though it was scarcely to be expected, I said, that I could yet have received information from my Government relative to the measure, and although, in fact, nothing had reached me, I was nevertheless most abundantly confident that it had originated in no unfriendly motive or feeling. It had so happened, I continued, that I had been honored with some knowledge of the Executive deliberations at about the time the Ontario sailed, which left me the less scruple in making this assertion. It was true I had come away before her final departure; but sure I felt that there could have been no alteration in the unexceptionable views that had suggested the voyage; and, above all, I subjoined, that the use of force, as a means of re-establishing our previous dominion, had in nowise coupled itself with the intentions that were formed. These assurances, I thought, appeared to go some lengths towards placing the transaction in its innocent and justifiable lights. Given, as they were, frankly, I hope that what I said may be found to meet the President's approbation. I felt all the extravagance of the supposition that there had been any deviation, on the part of the Government, in this instance, from its wonted respect to the rights of other nations. Lord Castlereagh did not, in any way, unfold the nature of the British claim.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Rush, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in London, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 20, 1818.

From the tenor of your correspondence with Lord Castlereagh, reported in your despatch No. 7, as well as from the communications made here on the same subject by Mr. Bagot, it appears that the British Government have acceded to the proposals heretofore made on our part, to refer the question which has arisen upon the construction of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, in relation to the restitution of slaves carried away from the United States after the ratification of the treaty of peace, to the arbitration of a friendly sovereign. This accession is understood to be absolute and unconditional, but accompanied with the suggestion of a wish on the part of the British Cabinet to try, as a previous measure, the experiment adopted for the adjustment of other questions between the two countries, of submitting the case to the decision of commissioners mutually chosen by the two parties; submitting at the same time to the same, or other commissioners appointed in like manner, the ascertainment and demarcation of a boundary line from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, westward; and the right and title of the United States to a settlement at the mouth of Columbia river on the Pacific ocean.

If the proposal to refer to commissioners the decision of the question relating to the slaves, before having recourse to the arbitration, had been confined to that object, it would have been accepted without hesitation or delay. But it has been so connected with the others, that Lord Castlereagh at least avoided committing his Government to the engagement of disposing, in that manner, of this particular point of difference by itself. Mr. Bagot's statement of the proposal is of the same character. Without explicitly declaring that the British Government would decline submitting the slave question alone to commissioners, he did not profess to be authorized to agree to it separately, and urged, on various grounds, the expediency of arranging, as soon as possible, and by the same means, all the subjects which might even be hereafter occasions of misunderstanding between the two countries.

Taken altogether as a complicated proposal, it involves a multitude of considerations, which require some deliberation before a definitive answer can be given. As soon as the President shall have come to a determination concerning it, the result will be immediately communicated to you. In the mean time, it may be proper that you should assure Lord Castlereagh that it was entirely owing to accident, and to the communications which had previously passed between the late Secretary of State and Mr. Baker, concerning the restitution of the post at the mouth of Columbia river, that the Ontario was despatched for the purpose of resuming our possession there, without giving notice of the expedition to Mr. Bagot and to his Government. Copies of these communications are herewith enclosed, from which it was concluded that no authorized English establishment existed at that place; and as they intimated no question whatever of the title of the United States to the settlement which existed before the late war, it did not occur that any such question had since arisen, which could make it an object of interest to Great Britain. You are authorized to add, that notice of the departure of the Ontario, and of the object of her voyage, would nevertheless have been given, but that the expedition was determined, and the vessel despatched, during the President's absence from the seat of Government the last season.

These explanations have already been given to Mr. Bagot, who has expressed himself entirely satisfied with them, and his conviction that they will be equally satisfactory to his Government. As it was not anticipated that any disposition existed in the British Government to start questions of title with us on the borders of the South sea, we could have no possible motive for reserve or concealment with regard to the expedition of the Ontario. In suggesting these ideas to Lord Castlereagh, rather in conversation than in any more formal manner, it may be proper to remark the minuteness of the present interests, either to Great Britain or the United States, involved in this concern; and the unwillingness, for that reason, of this Government to include it among the objects of serious discussion with them. At the same time you might give him to understand, though not unless in a manner to avoid every thing offensive in the suggestion, that, from the nature of things, if in the course of future events it should ever become an object of serious importance to the United States, it can scarcely be supposed that Great Britain would find it useful or advisable to resist their claim to possession by systematic opposition. If the United States leave her in undisturbed enjoyment of all her holds upon Europe, Asia, and Africa, with all her actual possessions in this hemisphere, we may very fairly expect that she will not think it consistent either with a wise or a friendly policy to watch with eyes of jealousy and alarm every possibility of extension to our natural dominion in North America, which she can have no solid interest to prevent, until all possibility of her preventing it shall have vanished.

Extracts of a letter from R. Rush, Esq., Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to the Secretary of State, dated

Lord Castlereagh returned from Ireland sooner than was expected, having got back on the 14th of this month. On the 15th I wrote him a note, requesting an official interview, which he granted me on the 16th.

I began the conversation by affording the explanations embraced in your despatch No. 4, respecting the Ontario's voyage to the mouth of the river Columbia. In the course of them, I particularly dwelt, according to your instructions, upon the correspondence which took place between the Secretary of State and Mr. Baker soon after the peace, in which the latter never made a question as to the valid title of the United States, or intimated the existence of any authorized establishment at that post, on the part of Great Britain, before the war. His lordship said nothing in reply, though it appeared to me that the explanation was satisfactory to him, removing as it does all ground of complaint.

From Mr. Prevost to the Secretary of State.

MONTEREY, NEW CALIFORNIA,

November 11, 1818.

SIR: In conformity with mine of the 27th July, which I had the honor to address to your Department from Lima, I proceeded in His Britannic Majesty's sloop-of-war Blossom to the mouth of the Columbia, and entered the river on the 1st of October following. A few days thereafter, to wit, on the 6th, as you will perceive by referring to a copy of the act of surrender, (marked A,) I received in the name, and on the part of the United States, the possession of the establishment at Fort George, made under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, by Captain Hickey, of the royal navy, in compliance with the orders of the Prince Regent for that purpose, signified to him through the medium of the Earl Bathurst. The British flag was thereupon lowered, and that of the United States hoisted in its stead, where it now waves in token both of possession and of sovereignty.

The establishment, of which the annexed sketch (No. 1) will give you a correct idea, has been considerably extended and improved by the agents of the Northwest Company of Canada, who will continue to occupy and protect it under our flag, until it shall please the President to give orders for their removal. I will, however, suggest that, when this disposition shall take place, time ought to be granted in a ratio with the distance, to enable them to obtain the means of transporting the private property deposited there, consisting of dry goods, furs, and implements of war, to a large amount. Shortly after the ceremony and surrender, I received a note on this subject from Mr. Keith, the gentleman whose signature accompanies that of Captain Hickey, which, together with a copy of my answer, (No. 2,) is submitted for your inspection. A sense of justice would have dictated the assurances I have given him in reply; but I had a further motive, which was that of subsiding the apprehensions excited by the abrupt visit of the Ontario. It appeared to me prudent, in this view, to take no notice of the suggestion relative to a discussion of boundary, and, in answering, to avoid any intimation of immediate or of future removal, as either might have induced him to form a settlement elsewhere on the river, and thus give rise to collisions between the two Governments which may now be wholly avoided.

The bay is spacious, contains several anchoring places in a sufficient depth of water, and is by no means so difficult of ingress as has been represented. Those enjoying the exclusive commerce have probably cherished an impression so favorable to its continuance, growing out of the incomplete survey of Lieutenant Broughton, made under the orders of Vancouver, in 1792. It is true that there is a bar extending across the mouth of the river, at either extremity of which are, at times, appalling breakers; but it is equally true that it offers, at the lowest tides, a depth of twenty-one feet of water throughout a passage exempt from them of nearly a league in width. The Blossom, carrying more guns than the Ontario, encountering a change of wind while in the channel, was compelled to let go the anchor, and, when again weighed, to tack and beat in order to reach the harbor, yet found a greater depth, and met with no difficulty either then or on leaving the bay. The survey marked C may be relied on for its accuracy. The bearings, distances, and soundings, were taken by Captain Hickey, who was kind enough to lend himself to the examination, and to furnish me with this result. It is the more interesting as it shows that, with the aid of buoys, the access to vessels of almost any tonnage may be rendered secure. In addition to this, it is susceptible of entire defence, because a ship, after passing the bar, in order to avoid the breaking of the sea on one of the banks, is obliged to bear up directly for the knoll forming the cape, at all times, to approach within a short distance of its base, and most frequently then to anchor. Thus, a small battery erected on this point, in conjunction with the surges on the opposite side, would so endanger the approach as to deter an enemy, however hardy, from the attempt.

This outlet, the only one between the thirty-eighth and fifty-third degrees of latitude, embraces the entire range of country from the ocean to the mountains, and its interior unites the advantage of a water communication throughout, by means of the many streams tributary to the Columbia; two of which disembogue opposite to each other, within twenty-five leagues of the port, are navigable, and nearly of equal magnitude with this beautiful river. The ocean teems with the otter, (mustela,) the seal, and the whale; while the main land affords, in innumerable quantities, the common otter, (musk,) the bear, the buffalo, and the whole variety of deer.

It has been observed by those exploring this coast that the climate to the southward of 53 degrees assumes a mildness unknown in the same latitude on the eastern side of the Continent. Without digressing to speculate upon the cause, I will merely state that such is particularly the fact in 46 degrees 16 minutes, the site of Fort George. The mercury during the Winter seldom descends below the freezing point; when it does so, it is rarely stationary for any number of days, and the severity of the season is more determined by the quantity of water than by its congelation. The rains usually commence with November, and continue to fall partially until the latter end of March or beginning of April. A benign Spring succeeds; and when the Summer heats obtain, they are so tempered by showers as seldom to suspend vegetation. I found it luxuriant on my arrival, and during a fortnight's stay experienced no change of weather to retard its course. The soil is good; all the cereal, gramina, and tuberous plants may be cultivated with advantage, and the waters abound in salmon, sturgeon, and other varieties of fish.

The natives, in appearance as well as in character, differ essentially from those with us. They are less in stature, more delicately formed, and singular in the shape of the head, which, in infancy, is compressed between two small plates of wood or metal, so as in its growth to obtain the semblance of a wedge. They are inquisitive, cheerful, sagacious, possess fewer of the vices attributed to the savage, and are less addicted to cruelties in war; scalping is unknown to them, and a prisoner suffers the infliction of no other punishment than that of becoming a slave to the captor; but as they neither sow nor reap, an observer cannot easily discern in what the servitude consists. The wants of the one are supplied by his own address in the use of the bow and the spear, while those of the other require the same efforts and equal skill for their gratification.

The language on the side of the falls bears a strong analogy to that of Nootka, so much so that, with the aid of a Spanish vocabulary of the latter, accompanying the voyage of Valdes, I could, notwithstanding the imperfection in this mode of conveying and of obtaining sounds, express my wants and be perfectly understood. I met with several of the natives who had heretofore volunteered on board of some one of our vessels in their fur excursions, two of whom had acquired a sufficient knowledge of our language to speak it with some ease, and were extremely solicitous to embark with us.

I regret that I could not collect sufficient data upon which to ground an estimate of the furs gathered on the Columbia; it was impossible, for reasons that are obvious. Humboldt has undertaken to number those of the otter taken on the coast and shipped to China, of which he assigns five-sixths to the American; he may be correct in the quantity, but I doubt whether the proportion be quite so great, as it frequently happens that the English adventurer confides his stock to our countrymen in order to participate in the benefit of a market, from a direct intercourse with which he is excluded by the laws of his country.

Perhaps I have gone too much into detail; but it appeared to me that, by exhibiting the importance of the position only, I should not have fulfilled the object of the President; that it was equally incumbent upon me to present a view of the country, of its inhabitants, of its resources, of its approach, and of its means of defence. I shall now conclude with the relation of an occurrence which may and ought to influence the course to be adopted and pursued as to this station.

The speculations of Humboldt, his glowing descriptions of the soil and climate of this province, have probably given a new direction to the ambition of Russia, and determined its Emperor to the acquisition of empire in America. Until 1816 the settlements of this Power did not reach to the southward of 55°,* and were of no consideration, although dignified by them with the title of Russian America. In the commencement of that year two distinct establishments were made, of a different and of a more imposing character: the first at Atooi, one of the Sandwich islands; the other in this vicinity, within a few leagues of San Francisco, the most northerly possession of Spain, in 37° 56'. The sketch I subjoin, marked D, was procured from a member of the Government at this place; from whom I also learned that its augmentation has since become so considerable as to excite serious alarm. Two Russian ships left this on their way thither a few days anterior to our arrival; the one having on board mechanics of every description, together with implements of husbandry. We passed sufficiently near the spot assigned to it to distinguish the coast with some precision, and ascertained that it was an open road—a circumstance that renders the position liable to many objections, if intended to be permanent; in other respects, the choice is judicious for an infant colony. It enjoys a climate still milder than that of Columbia, is environed by a beautiful country, and its proximity to an old settlement enables the Russian to partake of the numerous herds of black cattle and horses that have been there multiplying for the last fifty years. The port of St. Francis is one of the most convenient, extensive, and safe in the world, wholly without defence, and in the neighborhood of a feeble, diffused, and disaffected population. Under all these circumstances, may we not infer views to the early possession of this harbor, and ultimately to the sovereignty of entire California? Surely the growth of a race on these shores, scarcely emerged from the savage state, guided by a chief who seeks not to emancipate but to enthral, is an event to be deprecated—an event, the mere apprehension of which ought to excite the jealousies of the United States, so far, at least, as to induce the cautionary measure of preserving a station which may serve as a barrier to a northern aggrandizement.

I have not been able to gather other information respecting the settlement at Atooi than that of an assurance of its existence—a fact corroborated by the visit of the two ships to those islands in their route hither. The Russians are not yet such enterprising navigators as to augment sea risks by extending a voyage several thousand miles without an object. Such was the case in this instance, unless connected with the settlement, as they had sailed from Lima abundantly supplied a few weeks prior to my first visit to that city, in April last.

These islands yield the sandal wood, so much esteemed in China, and have been resorted to by our vessels for years past, not only in search of this valuable article, but of the necessary stock of fresh provisions to supply the crew during their cruise on the northwest coast. How far this intercourse may be affected hereafter by this encroachment, is also a subject for the consideration of the President.

I have taken the liberty to enclose a note marked E, of the authorities, Spanish as well as English, that have fallen under my view, illustrating the discovery of the Columbia by Mr. Gray, in 1791. Its subsequent occupation in 1811, by which the sovereignty of the United States was completed, to the exclusion of any European claimant, is a fact of which the surrender of the sole establishment on the river is conclusive evidence.

I have the honor to be, &c.

patch from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, addressed to the partners or agents of the Northwest Company, bearing date 27th January, 1818, and in obedience to subsequent orders, dated the 26th July last, from William H. Sheriff, Esq., Captain of His Majesty's ship Andromache, we, the undersigned, do, in conformity to the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, restore to the Government of the United States, through its agent, J. B. Prevost, Esq., the settlement of Fort George, on the river Columbia.

Given under our hands, in triplicate, at Fort George, Columbia river, this 6th October, 1818.

F. HICKEY,

Captain of H. M. Ship Blossom.

JAMES KEITH,

Of the Northwest Company.

I do hereby acknowledge to have this day received, on behalf of the Government of the United States, the possession of the settlement designated above, in conformity to the first article of the Treaty of Ghent.

Given under my hand, in triplicate, at Fort George, Columbia river, this 6th October, 1818.

Mr. Keith to Mr. Prevost.

FORT GEORGE, COLUMBIA RIVER,

October 6, 1818.

SIR: Now that the restitution and the settlement have been made, and that the Northwest Company are still allowed to occupy it in the prosecution of their commercial pursuits, permit me to submit to you the following important queries, to which I request a candid and explicit reply: Whether or not you feel authorized, on behalf of the United States, to tender me any assurance, or to afford any security, that no abandonment or relinquishment of said settlement will be claimed by your Government in favor of any of its subjects, to the ejection and exclusion of said Northwest Company, prior to the final decision of the right of sovereignty to the country between our respective Governments? And pending such discussion, as also in the event of such sovereignty being confirmed to the United States, may the Northwest Company implicitly rely on the justice and equity of your Government, that adequate allowance will be made for any extension or amelioration of aforesaid settlement, or of the trade dependent thereon, of which circumstances may from time to time suggest the propriety? I have the honor, &c.

JAMES KEITH,

Acting for self and Northwest Co.

No. 2.

FORT GEORGE, COLUMBIA,

October 6, 1818.

SIR: In answer to your note of this morning, I have the honor to state that the principal object of the President in sending me thus far was to obtain such information of the place, of its access, and of its commercial importance, as might enable him to submit to the consideration of Congress measures for the protection and extension of the establishment. From hence you will perceive that, until the sense of the Government may be taken upon my report, any assurances I might offer to meet the wishes expressed by you would be as unauthorized as unavailing.

I, however, sir, have no hesitation in saying that should it hereafter comport with the views of the nation to foster the settlement, any claim of the Northwest Company, justified by the usages of nations, will be liquidated with great liberality; and that, should its policy induce a system of exclusion, it will never extend to your removal without sufficient notice to prevent loss and injury to the company.

I cannot take my leave, sir, without expressing my approbation of the manner in which an establishment so precarious has been managed, nor without offering a hope that the same judicious course may be pursued under the change of flag for its success, until the pleasure of the President can be known.

Government, in adopting the regulation, supposes that a foreign ship, which shall have sailed from a European port after the 1st of March, 1822, or from one of the ports of the United States after the 1st of July of the same year, cannot lawfully pretend ignorance of these new measures.

The undersigned eagerly embraces this occasion of offering to Mr. Adams the assurance of his high consideration.

Mr. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Edict of His Imperial Majesty, Autocrat of all the Russias.

The Directing Senate maketh known unto all men:

Whereas, in an edict of His Imperial Majesty, issued to the Directing Senate on the 4th day of September, and signed by His Imperial Majesty's own hand, it is thus expressed:

"Observing, from reports submitted to us, that the trade of our subjects on the Aleutian islands, and on the northwest coast of America, appertaining unto Russia, is subjected, because of secret and illicit traffic, to oppression and impediments; and finding that the principal cause of these difficulties is the want of rules establishing the boundaries for navigation along these coasts, and the order of naval communication, as well in these places as on the whole of the eastern coast of Siberia and the Kurile islands, we have deemed it necessary to determine these communications by specific regulations, which are hereto attached.

"In forwarding these regulations to the Directing Senate, we command that the same be published for universal information, and that the proper measures be taken to carry them into execution."

COUNT D. GURIEF,
Minister of Finances.

It is, therefore, decreed by the Directing Senate that His Imperial Majesty's edict be published for the information of all men, and that the same be obeyed by all whom it may concern.

[On the original is written, in the handwriting of His Imperial Majesty, thus:]

Be it accordingly.

ALEXANDER.

KAMENNOY OSTROFF, Sept. 4, 1821.

Rules established for the limits of navigation and order of communication along the coast of the Eastern Siberia, the northwestern coast of America, and the Aleutian, Kurile, and other islands.

SEC. 1. The pursuits of commerce, whaling, and fishery, and of all other industry, on all islands, ports, and gulfs, including the whole of the northwest coast of America, beginning from Bhering's Strait to the fifty-first degree of northern latitude; also from the Aleutian islands to the eastern coast of Siberia, as well as along the Kurile islands from Bhering Strait to the south cape of the island of Urup, viz: to 45 degrees, 50 minutes northern latitude, are exclusively granted to Russian subjects.

SEC. 2. It is therefore prohibited to all foreign vessels not only to land on the coasts and islands belonging to Russia, as stated above, but also to approach them within less than a hundred Italian miles. The transgressor's vessel is subject to confiscation, along with the whole cargo.

SEC. 3. An exception to this rule is to be made in favor of vessels carried thither by heavy gales, or real want of provisions, and unable to make any other shores but such as belong to Russia; in these cases they are obliged to produce convincing proofs of actual reason for such an exception. Ships of friendly Governments, merely on discoveries, are likewise exempt from the foregoing rule, (section 2.) In this case, however, they must previously be provided with passports from the Russian Minister of the Navy.

SEC. 4. Foreign merchant ships which, for reasons stated in the foregoing rule, touch at any of the above-mentioned coasts, are obliged to endeavor to choose a place where Russians are settled, and to act as hereunder stated.

SEC. 5. On the arrival of a foreign merchant ship, wind and weather permitting, a pilot will meet her to appoint an anchoring place appropriated for the purpose. The captain who, notwithstanding this, anchors elsewhere without being able to assign a proper reason to the commander of the place, shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars.

SEC. 6. All rowing boats of foreign merchant vessels are obliged to land at one place appointed for them, where, in the daytime, a white flag is hung out, and at night a lantern, and where a clerk is to attend continually to prevent importing and exporting any articles or goods. Whoever lands at any other place, even without an intent of smuggling, shall pay a fine of fifty dollars; and if a person be discovered bringing any articles ashore, a fine of five hundred dollars is to be exacted, and the goods to be confiscated.

SEC. 7. The commanders of said vessels being in want of provisions, stores, &c., for the continuation of their voyage, are bound to apply to the commander of the place, who will appoint where these may be obtained, after which they may, without difficulty, send their boats there to procure all they want. Whosoever deviates from this rule shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars.

SEC. 8. If it be unavoidable, for the purpose of repairing or careening a foreign merchant ship, that she discharge the whole cargo, the master is obliged to ask the permission of the commander of the place. In this case the captain shall deliver to the commander an exact list of the nature and quality of the goods discharged. Every one who omits to report any part of the cargo will be suspected of smuggling, and shall pay a fine of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 9. All expenses incurred by these vessels during their stay in the Russian territories must be paid in cash or bills of exchange. In case, however, the captains of these ships have no money on board, and nobody gives security for their bonds, the commander can, at their request, allow the sale of such articles, stores, or goods, required merely for defraying the above-stated expenses. These sales, however, can be made only to the company, and through the means of the commander, but must not exceed the expenses of the ships, under penalty of the cargo being seized, and a fine paid of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 10. As soon as said foreign merchant vessels are ready for their cargoes, stores, provisions, &c., they must immediately proceed to take them in; and after an examination, if they have loaded all the above-stated articles, and a written certificate of their not having left any thing behind, they are to set sail.

Such vessels as have not been unloaded are likewise subjected to sail without the least delay, as soon as they are able to proceed to sea.

SEC. 11. It is prohibited to all commanders of said foreign vessels, commissioners, and others, whosoever they may be, to receive any articles, stores, or goods in those places where they will have landed, except in the case as per section 7, under penalty of seizure of their ship and cargo.

SEC. 12. It is prohibited to these foreign ships to receive on board, without especial permission of the commanders, any of the people in the service of the company, or of the foreigners living in the company's settlements.

Ships proved to have the intention of carrying off any person belonging to the colony shall be seized.

SEC. 13. Every purchase, sale, or barter, is prohibited betwixt a foreign merchant ship and people in the service of the company. This prohibition extends equally to those who are on shore and to those employed in the company's ships.

Any ship acting against this rule shall pay five times the value of the articles, stores, or goods, constituting this prohibited traffic.

SEC. 14. It is likewise interdicted to foreign ships to carry on any traffic or barter with the natives of the islands and of the northwest coast of America, in the whole extent here above mentioned. A ship convicted of this trade shall be confiscated.

SEC. 15. All articles, stores, and goods, found on shore in ports or harbors belonging to Russian subjects, (carrying on prohibited traffic,) or to foreign vessels, are to be seized.

SEC. 16. The foreign merchant ships lying in harbor, or in the roads, dare, under no pretence, send out their boats to vessels at sea, or to those already come in, until they have been spoken to and visited, according to the existing customs. Whenever a foreign vessel hoists a yellow flag, to announce an infectious disease being on board, or the symptoms of the same, or any other danger of which she wishes to be freed, every communication is interdicted until said flag is taken down. From this rule, however, are excepted persons appointed for the purpose, and whose boats are under the colors of the Russian American Company.

Any vessel acting contrary to this regulation shall pay a fine of five hundred dollars.

SEC. 17. No ballast may be thrown overboard but in such places as are appointed by the commanders. The transgressor is liable to a fine of five hundred dollars.

SEC. 18. To all foreign merchant ships, during their stay in anchoring places, harbors, or roads, it is prohibited to have their guns loaded either with balls or cartridges, under the risk of paying a fine of fifty dollars for each gun.

SEC. 19. No foreign merchant ship in port, or in the roads, or riding at anchor, may fire guns or muskets without previously informing the commander of the place or settlement, unless it be for pilots, signalizing the same by the firing of one, two, or three guns, and hoisting her colors, as is customary in similar wants. In acting contrary thereto, she is subjected to a fine of one hundred dollars for each shot.

SEC. 20. On the arrival of a foreign ship in the harbor, or in the roads, a boat will immediately be sent to meet her, and to deliver to the captain a printed copy of these regulations, for which he must give receipt in a book destined for the purpose. He is further obliged to state in the book all information required of foreign vessels. All ships refusing to comply with these regulations dare not approach the harbor, roads, or any anchoring place.

SEC. 21. The captain of a foreign merchant ship, coming to anchor in a port, or in the roads, is obliged, on his arrival, to give a statement of the health of the ship's crew; and should, after this, a contagious illness be discovered on board of his vessel, he must immediately inform the commander of the place thereof. The vessel, according to circumstances, will be either sent off, or put under quarantine in a place appropriated for the purpose, when the crew may be cured without putting the inhabitants in danger of infection. Should the captain of such a ship conceal the circumstance, the same will be confiscated, with her whole cargo.

SEC. 22. The master of a vessel, at the request of the commander of a place, is obliged to produce a list of the whole crew and all the passengers; and, should he omit any, he shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars for every one left out.

SEC. 23. The captains are bound to keep their crews in strict order and proper behaviour on the coasts and in the ports, and likewise to prevent their trading or bartering with the company's people. They are answerable for the conduct of their sailors and other inferiors. Illicit trade carried on by sailors subjects the vessel to the same penalty as if done by the captain himself; because it were easy for the captains to carry on smuggling without punishment, and justify themselves by throwing the fault on the sailors. Therefore, every article found upon sailors, which they could not hide in their pockets, or under their clothes, to screen from their superiors, sold or brought on shore, will be considered as contraband from the ship, and is subject to the prescribed fine.

SEC. 24. Foreign men-of-war shall likewise comply with the above-stated regulations for the merchant ships, to maintain the rights and benefit of the company. In case of opposition, complaints will be made to their Governments.

SEC. 25. In case a ship of the Russian Imperial navy, or one belonging to the Russian American Company, meet a foreign vessel on the above-stated coasts, in harbors or roads within the before-mentioned limits, and the commander find grounds, by the present regulation, that the ship be liable to seizure, he is to act as follows:

SEC. 26. The commander of a Russian vessel, suspecting a foreign to be liable to confiscation, must inquire and search the same, and, finding her guilty, take possession of her. Should the foreign vessel resist, he is to employ, first, persuasion, then threats, and at last force; endeavoring, however, at all events, to do this with as much reserve as possible. If the foreign vessel employ force against force, then he shall consider the same as an evident enemy, and force her to surrender according to the naval laws.

SEC. 27. After getting every thing in order and safety on board the foreign vessel, the commander of the Russian ship, or the officer sent by him, shall demand the journal of the captured vessel, and on the spot shall note down in the same that, on such a day, month, and year, at such an hour, and in such a place, he met such and such a foreign vessel; and shall give a brief account of the circumstance, pursuit, and, finally of the seizure. After signing the same, he shall desire the captain of the captured vessel to confirm the same in his own handwriting.

Should he, however, refuse to sign the same, the Russian officer is to repeat his summons in presence of all the officers; and if, on this, it be again refused, and nobody will sign in lieu of the captain, he is then to add this circumstance, signed by himself.

After this arrangement, the journal, list of the crew, passports, invoices, accounts, and all further papers, respecting the views and pursuits of the voyage of the vessel, shall be put up in one parcel, as well as all private papers, viz: the journals of the officers, letters, &c., and sealed with the seals of the Russian officer, and those of the captain and first officer of the foreign vessel. This packet shall remain unsealed with the commander of the Russian vessel until their arrival in the port of St. Peter and Paul, where it shall be deposited in the court, as mentioned in section 33. Besides this, every thing else must be sealed by the Russian officer and the foreign captain that is not requisite for the continuation of the voyage to the port of St. Peter and Paul, excepting the effects for immediate and sole use of the ship's crew, which shall not be withheld from them.

SEC. 28. Having thus fixed all means of precaution, the officer sent to arrest the foreign vessel shall instantly make his report to his chief, and await his orders.

SEC. 29. Thus should, by any cause stated in the second, eleventh, twelfth, and twenty-first sections of these regulations, a foreign vessel be subjected to confiscation in any port near the settlements of the Russian American Company, the commander of that settlement is obliged either to ask the assistance of the Russian man-of-war, if there be any, and the commander of which, on receipt of a written request, is obliged to arrest the vessel, and use all the precautions prescribed in the foregoing article; or, if there be no Russian man-of-war in the harbor or its neighborhood, and the commander of the settlement find that he and his people can arrest the vessel by themselves, he then is to act according to the twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, and twenty-eighth sections; and, putting ashore the captain, and every means of getting the vessel away, he must endeavor, as soon as possible, to give information of this event, either to the Governor of the colonies of the Russian American Company, or the commander of the Imperial man-of-war, if it be known where she lies.

SEC. 30. When, in consequence of such a report, the Governor of the colonies shall send a company's vessel, or a Government vessel arriving, then the commander of the place shall deliver up the vessel seized, and all belonging to her, and shall report respecting his reasons for confiscating the vessel.

SEC. 31. The commander of the vessel taking charge of the seizure, per inventory, shall examine immediately into all circumstances mentioned, and compare it with the accounts of the commander of the settlement, who will give every elucidation required.

SEC. 32. All vessels detained by Russian men-of-war are ordered by these regulations to be brought to the port of St. Peter and Paul, where the sentence is to be passed on them by a court established for adjudging such cases.

SEC. 33. This court, under the presidency of the commander of Kamtschatka, shall consist of the three senior officers under him, and of the commissioner of the Russian American company.

SEC. 34. As soon as a Russian vessel, bringing into the port of St. Peter and Paul a foreign vessel arrested by her, has come to anchor in the place assigned her, the commander of her is immediately to repair to the commander of Kamtschatka, stating briefly what vessel he has brought in, the number of the crew and of the sick, specifying their diseases, and reporting likewise whether the vessel has sufficient victuals, and what goods, guns, and other arms, powder, &c., are on board.

SEC. 35. The commander of Kamtschatka, on receiving this report, will order two officers and a sufficient number of men on board the detained vessel.

SEC. 36. These two officers, together with the officers who brought in the detained ship, when on board, are to summon the master, and two of his mates, or men in command next to him, inspect all the seals put on the vessel, and then, taking them off, begin immediately to make an accurate list of all the effects belonging to the vessel.

SEC. 37. This list is to be signed by all the officers on both sides who were present in drawing it up. The commander of Kamtschatka is to use all possible endeavors to secure from embezzlement or damage all effects belonging to the detained vessel.

SEC. 38. The crew of the vessel are then to be sent ashore to such places as shall be appointed by the commander of Kamtschatka, and remain there until the close of the investigation.

SEC. 39. The commander of the Russian vessel is obliged, in the course of two days after his arrival at the port of St. Peter and Paul, to make a minute representation to the commander of Kamtschatka of all that shall have happened at the detention of the foreign vessel brought in by him, and to deliver said vessel, together with the sealed packet containing her papers, expressed in section 27.

SEC. 40. If the Russian vessel that brought into the port of St. Peter and Paul a foreign vessel cannot, for reasons, remain there until the close of the investigation, but be obliged to proceed to sea in a very short time, the commander, in order not to detain her, shall use all possible despatch, by bringing forward the investigation of such points as may require the presence of the Russian vessel.

SEC. 41. Having settled every thing on board the arrested vessel, and landed the crew, the court shall immediately open the session, and endeavor to ascertain as soon as possible the solution of the inquiry, "Whether the vessel be lawfully arrested or not?"

SEC. 42. In order to ascertain this, the following proofs shall be substantiated:

1st. That the vessel was met with within the boundaries prescribed in the second section of these regulations, and that her having been within said limits was not occasioned by reasons stated in section 3.

2d. That the vessel is a lawful prize by virtue of the sections 2, 11, 12, 14, and 21 of these regulations, and section — of the instructions to the commander of the Russian man-of-war.

SEC. 43. In order to decide either case, the court is to inspect all documents presented, and, tracing on one part all proofs of guilt, and on the other all doubts which might clear the foreign vessel, summon the commanding officer of the Russian vessel to give all additional information deemed needful; and completing thus all circumstances condemning the foreign vessel, the court shall draw up a clear statement of the reasons of her condemnation.

SEC. 44. Should the court, in making out said statement, find that the foreign vessel has been arrested without sufficient cause, said court, on passing the sentence, is to determine the damages suffered by such detention, and to furnish both parties with a certified copy of this resolution.

SEC. 45. In the course of two days both parties shall declare whether they are satisfied with the decision of the court or not, and in the latter case (should it happen) assign it in writing.

SEC. 46. Should both parties be satisfied with the decision of the court, then the commander of Kamtschatka is to release immediately the detained vessel, returning every thing to the master according to the inventory, along with the adjudged damages, exacting them from whomsoever is to pay the same.

SEC. 47. If, on the contrary, the court receive on the third day an appeal from its decision, it is bound to take that appeal into immediate consideration, and, finding it just, to change its decision; if not, to confirm the same, and make it known to the parties a second time. After this, no representations shall be admitted, and both parties shall be summoned before the court, which will allow them to make their protest in writing, and will then state all the reasons why the sentence passed should be carried into execution.

SEC. 48. If the court find by the indictment that the vessel has been lawfully detained, then the master of the foreign vessel, or the two oldest in command under him, shall be summoned, and the reasons of their detention made known to them, giving them a certified copy of the condemnation.

SEC. 49. The court is to receive within three days, and no later, the representations of the master; and if he do not present the same within the time limited, the court summoning him, with two of his crew, notifies that his silence is received as a mark of compliance, and that the condemnation is just.

SEC. 50. In this case the court comes to its final decision, which, on the following day, is communicated to the whole crew of the foreign vessel, who shall sign, all and every one, that such sentence has been made known to them; after which, the commander of Kamtschatka is to carry the sentence of the court into execution, as will be explained hereafter.

SEC. 51. Should, however, the master deliver within the limited time his protest, then the court, examining it with all possible impartiality, shall call for all further explanations; and, having inserted the whole into the journal of the court, shall pass a final sentence, and pronounce it as stated in section 47.

SEC. 52. If by the sentence of the court the arrested vessel be released, and adjudged to receive damages for her detention, and if the vessel has been arrested by any of the company's officers, and the damages are not above five thousand rubles, the commander of Kamtschatka shall demand immediate payment of said sum from the officer of the Russian American Company; but if the damages exceed that sum, he is to notify it to the company's office, and give to the foreign master a certificate; but the money cannot be paid by the company otherwise than after the inspection and resolution of its court of directors. If, on the other hand, the foreign vessel has been detained unlawfully by a Russian man-of-war, the commander of Kamtschatka is to pay the adjudged damages (not exceeding the sum of five thousand rubles) out of any Government sum, and to report in order to incash it from the guilty; but if the damages should exceed the sum of five thousand rubles, the commander of Kamtschatka is to furnish a certificate for the receipt of that money after the regulation and confirmation of the Russian Government.

SEC. 53. The reimbursement of such damages as may have been incurred by unlawful detention shall be exacted from the commander, and all officers of the man-of-war who, having been called by the commander to a council, shall have given their opinion that such a ship ought to be detained.

SEC. 54. As soon as a foreign ship is sentenced to be confiscated, the commander of Kamtschatka is to make due arrangements for transporting the crew to Ochotzk, and from thence to any of the ports of the Baltic, in order to enable every one of them to reach his own country. With the confiscated ship and cargo he is to act as with a prize taken in time of war.

SEC. 55. After this, the commander of Kamtschatka shall order a committee to value the vessel and her cargo. This committee is to be composed of one member appointed by the commander of Kamtschatka, one by the commander of the man-of-war, and a third by the Russian American Company,

SEC. 56. These commissioners are to make up a specified list and valuation, according to the following rules:

1st. All provisions, rigging, iron, powder, and arms shall be put down at such prices as they cost Government there.

2d. All merchandises which might be used in Kamtschatka and the company's colonies, and which are carried there at times from Russia, shall be valued at their prices then existing.

3d. All goods which are not imported into these places from Russia, but are wanted there, shall be valued like goods brought from Russia, being the nearest to them, and in proportion to their wants.

4th. All goods not in use in Kamtschatka or the colonies, shall be sent to Irkutsk, and sold at public auction by the proper authorities.

SEC. 57. The said commissioners shall present their valuation to the commander of Kamtschatka for his approbation; who, in case of not finding the same exact, shall return it with his remarks, and shall appoint other officers to inspect such articles as may appear unfairly valued.

SEC. 58. If the commissioners hereafter continue in their opinion, and the commander of Kamtschatka find it impossible to agree thereto, he shall provisionally consent, and leave the final decision to Government.

SEC. 59. According to this valuation, the commander of Kamtschatka shall mark for the use of Government all those articles which he thinks are wanted; the remainder is left at the disposal of the officers of the ship, or of the Russian American Company. The seized vessel shall be valued by the court, and the valuation sent immediately to the Minister of the Navy, with a report whether such a vessel is wanted for Government service or not.

SEC. 60. The whole sum of valuation of the confiscated vessel and cargo is to be divided in the following manner: the expenses necessary to forward the ship's crew to one of the ports on the Baltic are to be deducted, and the remaining sum divided, if the vessel has been taken by the Russian American Company's officers, and carried to the port of St. Peter and Paul by a ship of said company, without the interference of a man-of-war, into five parts, of which one goes to the Government, and the remaining four-fifths to the American Company; if the vessel be taken in any of the company's settlements by the company's officers, but brought to the port of St. Peter and Paul by a man-of-war, after deducting one-fifth for Government, two-fifths are to belong to the crew of the man-of-war, and the remaining two-fifths to the Russian American Company; and, finally, if such foreign vessel be detained by men-of-war only, without the assistance of the company's officers, then, after deducting one-fifth for Government, the remainder is left to the officers of the men-of-war.

But if a vessel be taken by the conjoint forces of a man-of-war and a company's vessel, then the prize shall be divided between them, in proportion to their strength, regulating the same according to the number of guns.

SEC. 61. The sum coming to the officers of the man-of-war shall be divided according to the rules for dividing prizes in time of war. In all cases, officers who had a share in seizing foreign vessels convicted of the intention of infringing the privileges most graciously granted to the Russian American Company may expect to receive tokens of His Imperial Majesty's approbation, especially when, after deducting the expenses for conveying the crew, their part in the prize money could prove but trifling.

SEC. 62. If a foreign vessel, detained by a Russian, being under the command of a Russian officer, should be cast away before reaching the port of St. Peter and Paul, the following principles shall be observed:

If the foreign vessel alone be lost, and the Russian accompanying her arrive at the port of St. Peter and Paul, then the court acts according to the foregoing rules, to determine whether that vessel was lawfully seized. In this case Government takes upon itself the expenses of conveying to a port of the Baltic such of the ship's crew as were saved. But if such vessel should not be proved to have been detained lawfully, then, independent of those expenses, the ship shall be valued, and such valuation forwarded to Government for the payment of what may be deemed just. At the same time, investigations shall be made on the loss of the vessel; and the officer that had the command (if saved) is to be tried according to the maritime rules and regulations.

SEC. 63. That the commander of Kamtschatka is bound to make a special report to the Governor General of Siberia respecting every circumstance happening to foreign vessels, annexing copies of all documents, journals, and sentences of the court, and of all papers relating thereunto.

D. GURIEF, Minister of Finances.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Poletica.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, Feb'y 25, 1822.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note of the 11th instant, enclosing a printed copy of the regulations adopted by the Russian American Company, and sanctioned by His Imperial Majesty, relating to the commerce of foreigners in the waters bordering on the establishments of that company upon the northwest coast of America.

I am directed by the President of the United States to inform you that he has seen with surprise, in this edict, the assertion of a territorial claim on the part of Russia, extending to the fifty-first degree of north latitude on this continent, and a regulation interdicting to all commercial vessels other than Russian, upon the penalty of seizure and confiscation, the approach upon the high seas within one hundred Italian miles of the shores to which that claim is made to apply. The relations of the United States with His Imperial Majesty have always been of the most friendly character: and it is the earnest desire of this Government to preserve them in that state. It was expected, before any act which should define the boundary between the territories of the United States and Russia on this continent, that the same would have been arranged by treaty between the parties. To exclude the vessels of our citizens from the shore, beyond the ordinary distance to which the territorial jurisdiction extends, has excited still greater surprise.

This ordinance affects so deeply the rights of the United States and of their citizens, that I am instructed to inquire whether you are authorized to give explanations of the ground of right, upon principles generally recognised by the laws and usages of nations, which can warrant the claims and regulations contained in it.

I avail myself of this occasion to assure you of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The CHEVALIER DE POLETICA,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

The Chevalier de Poletica to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1822.

SIR: I received two days since the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the same day, by order of the President of the United States, in answer to my note of the 11th current, by which I discharged the orders of my Government in communicating to you the new regulation adopted by the Russian American Company, and sanctioned by His Majesty the Emperor, my august sovereign, on the 4th [16th] of September, 1821, relative to foreign commerce in the waters which border upon the establishments of the said company on the northwest coast of America.

Readily yielding, sir, to the desire expressed by you in your letter of knowing the rights and principles upon which are founded the determinate limits of the Russian possessions on the northwest coast of America, from Behring's strait to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, I am happy to fulfil this task by only calling your attention to the following historical facts, the authenticity of which cannot be contested:

The first discoveries of the Russians on the northwest continent of America go back to the time of the Emperor Peter I. They belong to the attempt made towards the end of the reign of this great monarch to find a passage from the icy sea into the Pacific ocean.

In 1728 the celebrated Captain Behring made his first voyage. The recital of his discoveries attracted the attention of the Government, and the Empress Anne intrusted to Captain Behring (1741) a new expedition in these same latitudes. She sent with him the academicians Gmelin, Delile dela Crayere, Muller, Steller, Fisher, Krasilnicoff, Kracheninicoff, and others; and the first chart of these countries which is known was the result of their labors, published in 1758. Besides the strait which bears the name of the chief of this expedition, he discovered a great part of the islands which are found between the two continents; Cape or Mount St. Elias, which still bears his name upon all the charts, was so called by Captain Behring, who discovered it on the day of the feast of the saint; and his second, Captain Tchiricoff, pushed his discoveries as far as the forty-ninth degree of north latitude.

The first private expeditions undertaken upon the northwest coast of America go back as far as the year 1743.

In 1763 the Russian establishments had already extended as far as the island of Kodiak, (or Kich-tak.) In 1778 Cook found them at Unalashka, and some Russian inscriptions at Kodiak. Vancouver saw the Russian establishment in the bay of Kinai. In fine, Captains Mirs, Portlock, and La Perouse, unanimously attest the existence of Russian establishments in these latitudes.

If the Imperial Government had at the time published the discoveries made by the Russian navigators after Behring and Tchiricoff, (viz. Chlodiloff, Screbreancoff, Krassilnicoff, Paycoff, Poushcareff, Lazareff, Medwedeff, Solowieff, Lewasheff, Krenitsin, and others,) no one could refuse to Russia the right of first discovery, nor could even any one deny her that of first occupation.

Moreover, when D. Jose Martinez was sent, in 1789, by the Court of Madrid, to form an establishment in Vancouver's island, and to remove foreigners from thence under the pretext that all that coast belonged to Spain, he gave not the least disturbance to the Russian colonies and navigators; yet the Spanish Government was not ignorant of their existence, for this very Martinez had visited them the year before. The report which Captain Malespina made of the results of his voyage proves that the Spaniards very well knew of the Russian colonies, and in this very report it is seen that the Court of Madrid acknowledged that its possessions upon the coast of the Pacific ocean ought not to extend to the north of Cape Blanc, taken from the point of Trinity, situated under 42 degrees 50 minutes of north latitude.

When, in 1799, the Emperor Paul I. granted to the present American Company its first charter, he gave it the exclusive possession of the northwest coast of America which belonged to Russia, from the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude to Behring's strait. He permitted them to extend their discoveries to the south, and there to form establishments, provided they did not encroach upon the territory occupied by other Powers.

This act, when made public, excited no claim on the part of other cabinets, not even on that of Madrid, which confirms that it did not extend its pretensions to the sixtieth degree.

When the Government of the United States treated with Spain for the cession of a part of the northwest coast, it was able to acquire, by the Treaty of Washington, the right to all that belonged to the Spaniards north of the forty-second degree of latitude; but this treaty says nothing positive concerning the northern boundary of this cession, because, in fact, Spain well knew that she could not say that the coast as far as the sixtieth degree belonged to her.

From this faithful exposition of known facts, it is easy, sir, as it appears to me, to draw the conclusion that the rights of Russia to the extent of the northwest coast, specified in the regulation of the Russian American Company, rest upon the three bases required by the general law of nations and immemorial usage among nations—that is, upon the title of first discovery; upon the title of first occupation; and, in the last place, upon that which results from a peaceable and uncontested possession of more than half a century—an epoch, consequently, several years anterior to that when the United States took their place among independent nations.

It is, moreover, evident, that if the right of the possession of a certain extent of the northwest coast of America, claimed by the United States, only devolves upon them in virtue of the Treaty of Washington, of 22d of February, 1819, (and I believe it would be difficult to make good any other title,) this treaty could not confer upon the American Government any right of claim against the limits assigned to the Russian possessions upon the same coast, because Spain herself had never pretended to similar right.

The Imperial Government, in assigning for limits to the Russian possessions of the northwest coast of America, on the one side Bhering's strait, and on the other the fifty-first degree of north latitude, has only made a moderate use of an incontestable right; since the Russian navigators, who were the first to explore that part of the American continent, in 1741, pushed their discovery as far as the forty-ninth degree of north latitude. The fifty-first degree, therefore, is no more than a mean point between the Russian establishment of New Archangel, situated under the fifty-seventh degree, and the American colony at the mouth of the Columbia, which is found under the forty-sixth degree of the same latitude.

All these considerations united have concurred in inspiring the Imperial Government with an entire conviction that, in the last arrangements adopted in Russia relative to her possessions on the northwest coast, the legitimate right of no foreign Power has been infringed. In this conviction, the Emperor, my august sovereign, has judged that his good right, and the obligation imposed by Providence upon him to protect with all his power the interests of his subjects, sufficiently justified the measures last taken by His Imperial Majesty in favor of the Russian American Company, without its being necessary to clothe them with the sanction of treaties.

I shall be more succinct, sir, in the exposition of the motives which determined the Imperial Government to prohibit foreign vessels from approaching the northwest coast of America belonging to Russia within the distance of at least one hundred Italian miles. This measure, however severe it may at first view appear, is, after all, but a measure of prevention. It is exclusively directed against the culpable enterprises of foreign adventurers, who, not content with exercising upon the coasts above mentioned an illicit trade very prejudicial to the rights reserved entirely to the Russian American Company, take upon them besides to furnish arms and ammunition to the natives in the Russian possessions in America, exciting them likewise in every manner to resistance and revolt against the authorities there established.

The American Government doubtless recollects that the irregular conduct of these adventurers, the majority of whom was composed of American citizens, has been the object of the most pressing remonstrances on the part of Russia to the Federal Government from the time that diplomatic missions were organized between the two countries. These remonstrances, repeated at different times, remain constantly without effect, and the inconveniences to which they ought to bring a remedy continue to increase.

The Imperial Government, respecting the intentions of the American Government, has always abstained from attributing the ill success of its remonstrances to any other motives than those which flow (if I may be allowed the expression) from the very nature of the institutions which govern the national affairs of the American confederation. But the high opinion which the Emperor has always entertained of the rectitude of the American Government cannot exempt him from the care which his sense of justice towards his own subjects imposes upon him. Pacific means not having brought any alleviation to the just grievances of the Russian American Company against foreign navigators in the waters which environ their establishments on the northwest coast of America, the Imperial Government saw itself under the necessity of having recourse to the means of coercion, and of measuring the rigor according to the inveterate character of the evil to which it wished to put a stop. Yet it is easy to discover, on examining closely the last regulation of the Russian American Company, that no spirit of hostility had any thing to do with its formation. The most minute precautions have been taken in it to prevent abuses of authority on the part of commanders of Russian cruisers appointed for the execution of said regulation. At the same time, it has not been neglected to give all the timely publicity necessary to put those on their guard against whom the measure is aimed.

Its action, therefore, can only reach the foreign vessels, which, in spite of the notification, will expose themselves to seizure by infringing upon the line marked out in the regulation. The Government flatters itself that these cases will be very rare; if all remain as at present appears, not one.

I ought, in the last place, to request you to consider, sir, that the Russian possessions in the Pacific ocean extend, on the northwest coast of America, from Behring's strait to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, and on the opposite side of Asia, and the islands adjacent, from the same strait to the forty-fifth degree. The extent of sea, of which these possessions form the limits, comprehends all the conditions which are ordinarily attached to shut seas, (mers fermées,) and the Russian Government might, consequently, judge itself authorized to exercise upon this sea the right of sovereignty, and especially that of entirely interdicting the entrance of foreigners. But it preferred only asserting its essential rights, without taking any advantage of localities.

The Emperor, my august sovereign, sets a very high value upon the maintenance of the relations of amity and good understanding which have till now subsisted between the two countries. The dispositions of His Imperial Majesty in this regard have never failed appearing at all times when an occasion has presented itself in the political relations of the United States with the European Powers; and surely, in the midst of a general peace, Russia does not think of aiming a blow at the maritime interests of the United States—she who has constantly respected them in those difficult circumstances in which Europe has been seen to be placed in the latter times, and the influence of which the United States have been unable to avert.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PIERRE DE POLETICA.

The Secretary of State to Mr. De Poletica.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 30, 1822.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 28th ultimo, which has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States.

From the deduction which it contains of the grounds upon which articles of regulation of the Russian American Company have now, for the first time, extended the claim of Russia on the northwest coast of America to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, its only foundation appears to be the existence of the small settlement of Novo Archangelsk, situated, not on the American continent, but upon a small island in latitude 57°; and the principle upon which you state that this claim is now advanced is, that the fifty-first degree is equidistant from that settlement of Novo Archangelsk and the establishment of the United States at the mouth of Columbia river. But, from the same statement, it appears that, in the year 1799, the limits prescribed by the Emperor Paul to the Russian American Company were fixed at the fifty-fifth degree of latitude, and that, in assuming now the latitude 51°, a new pretension is asserted, to which no settlement made since the year 1799 has given the color of a sanction.

This pretension is to be considered not only with reference to the question of territorial right, but also to that prohibition to the vessels of other nations, including those of the United States, to approach within one hundred Italian miles of the coasts. From the period of the existence of the United States as an independent nation, their vessels have freely navigated those seas, and the right to navigate them is a part of that independence.

With regard to the suggestion that the Russian Government might have justified the exercise of sovereignty over the Pacific ocean as a close sea, because it claims territory both on its American and Asiatic shores, it may suffice to say that the distance from shore to shore on this sea, in latitude 51° north, is not less than ninety degrees of longitude, or four thousand miles.

As little can the United States accede to the justice of the reason assigned for the prohibition above mentioned. The right of the citizens of the United States to hold commerce with the aboriginal natives of the northwest coast of America, without the territorial jurisdiction of other nations, even in arms and munitions of war, is as clear and indisputable as that of navigating the seas. That right has never been exercised in a spirit unfriendly to Russia; and although general complaints have occasionally been made on the subject of this commerce by some of your predecessors, no specific ground of charge has ever been alleged by them of any transaction in it which the United States were, by the ordinary laws and usages of nations, bound either to restrain or to punish. Had any such charge been made, it would have received the most pointed attention of this Government, with the sincerest and firmest disposition to perform every act and obligation of justice to yours which could have been required. I am commanded by the President of the United States to assure you that this disposition will continue to be entertained, together with the earnest desire that the most harmonious relations between the two countries may be preserved.

Relying upon the assurance in your note of similar dispositions reciprocally entertained by His Imperial Majesty towards the United States, the President is persuaded that the citizens of this Union will remain unmolested in the prosecution of their lawful commerce, and that no effect will be given to an interdiction manifestly incompatible with their rights.

I am happy to renew the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The CHEVALIER DE POLETICA.

The Chevalier de Poletica to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, March 21,
[April 2,] 1822.

SIR: I had the honor yesterday to receive the letter which you were pleased to address to me, dated 30th March last; and, not being authorized to continue the discussion to which it refers, I find myself under the necessity of taking the contents of that letter ad referendum, reserving myself to communicate it to my Government as soon as possible.

In the mean time, I shall take the liberty of submitting to your consideration some observations which have been suggested to me by certain passages in your letter which require particular notice.

In the first official letter which I had the honor of addressing to you, dated 16th [28th] February last, I thought I had succeeded in clearly demonstrating that the rights of Russia to the possession of a certain extent of the northwest coast of America, as far as these rights can be rendered legitimate by the first discovery, the first occupation, and a possession not contested for more than half a century—that these rights, I say, go back to times considerably earlier than the reign of the Emperor Paul I.

When this sovereign granted, in 1799, to the Russian American Company its first charter of incorporation, there had never been a question about abandoning to that company the right of sovereignty over one determinate portion of the northwest coast of America in all its plenitude. The question was purely and simply of conceding to the said company a part of the sovereignty, or rather certain exclusive privileges of commerce, and it is in this view that the act of 1799, to which you refer, sir, fixed the limits of the operations of the Russian American Company.

The rights of sovereignty belonging to Russia could lose nothing of their local extent in consequence of the concessions made to that company in the reign of the Emperor Paul. That these rights extended, in the opinion of the Imperial Government, farther south than the fifty-fifth degree of latitude, appears evident from the structure of the third article of the act of incorporation, which authorizes the company to form establishments south of the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude.

But what will dispel even the shadow of doubt in this regard is the authentic fact that, in 1789, the Spanish packet St. Charles, commanded by Captain Haro, found, in the latitude 48° and 49°, Russian establishments to the number of eight, consisting, in the whole, of twenty families, and four hundred and sixty-two individuals. These were the descendants of the companions of Captain Tchiricoff, who was supposed till then to have perished.

With such titles justifying the rights claimed by Russia, you yourself, sir, will agree that it is perfectly immaterial whether the Russian establishment at Novo Archangelsk be small or large. If the rights of territorial possession were measured according to the dimensions of the points occupied, what would become of those of the United States upon a very considerable extent of the same northwest coast? for the only American establishment ever yet known is certainly very inferior in stability to that of Russia at Novo Archangelsk.

In the same manner the great extent of the Pacific ocean at the fifty-first degree of latitude cannot invalidate the right which Russia may have of considering that part of the ocean as close.

But as the Imperial Government has not thought fit to take advantage of that right, all further discussion on this subject would be idle.

As to the right claimed for the citizens of the United States of trading with the natives of the country of the northwest coast of America, without the limits of the jurisdiction belonging to Russia, the Imperial Government will not certainly think of limiting it, and still less of attacking it there. But I cannot dissemble, sir, that this same trade beyond the fifty-first degree will meet with difficulties and inconveniences, for which the American owners will only have to accuse their own imprudence after the publicity which has been given to the measures taken by the Imperial Government for maintaining the rights of the Russian American Company in their absolute integrity.

I shall not finish this letter without repeating to you, sir, the very positive assurance which I have already had the honor once of expressing to you, that, in every case where the American Government shall judge it necessary to make explanations to that of the Emperor, the President of the United States may rest assured that these explanations will be always attended to by the Emperor, my august sovereign, with the most friendly, and, consequently, the most conciliatory dispositions.

Be pleased, sir, &c.

DE POLETICA.

NORWAY—COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY.

[Transmitted to the House, May 2, 1822.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In the Message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of their present session, it was mentioned that the Government of Norway had issued an ordinance for admitting the vessels of the United States and their cargoes into the ports of that kingdom upon the payment of no other or higher duties than are paid by Norwegian vessels, of whatever articles the said cargoes may consist, and from whatever ports the vessels laden with them may come.

In communicating this ordinance to the Government of the United States, that of Norway has requested the benefit of a similar and reciprocal provision for the vessels of Norway and their cargoes which may enter the ports of the United States.

This provision being within the competency only of the legislative authority of Congress, I communicate to them, herewith, copies of the communications received from the Norwegian Government in relation to the subject, and recommend the same to their consideration.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1822.

The Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Hughes.

STOCKHOLM, January 25, 1821.

By the express order of the King, the undersigned, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, has the honor to inform Mr. Hughes, Chargé d'affaires of the United States of North America, that, hereafter, vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, as well as their cargoes, will be subject, in the ports of the kingdom of Norway, to no other or higher duties of entry or clearance than those payable by the national vessels and their cargoes; so that every sort of distinction between Norwegian and American vessels may cease, and that neither the place from which a vessel arrives, nor the place of her destination, may be any cause of exception from the general rule. The cargoes may consist of the productions of the soil, or of the industry of such country, whatever it may be.

Norway—Commercial Reciprocity.

In requesting Mr. Hughes to be pleased to communicate the contents of this note to his Government, the undersigned embraces this opportunity of renewing to Mr. Hughes the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

COUNT D'ENGESTROM.

Baron de Stackelberg to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1821.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of His Majesty the King of Sweden and of Norway, has the honor to address, officially, his Excellency the Secretary of State of the United States, to inquire if, in virtue of the commercial regulations existing in the United States, the Norwegian commerce will enjoy in the ports of the said States the same advantages and immunities which have been lately granted in the ports of Norway to the American commerce.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his high consideration, &c.

STACKELBERG.

The Secretary of State to Baron de Stackelberg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 23, 1821.

The Secretary of State, in reference to the note of Baron de Stackelberg of the 11th instant, has the honor of informing him that, by an act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, "so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty of tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, is repealed, so far as the same respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign ships or vessels may belong; such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation, whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished."

And this act, by a subsequent act of Congress of 3d March, 1819, will cease and expire on the 1st day of January, 1824.

From the copy of a note from His Excellency Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Hughes, of the 25th of January last, it appears that all discriminating or countervailing duties in the kingdom of Norway, so far as they operated to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished; and if it be desired by the Baron de Stackelberg that a proclamation from the President should issue, declaring Norwegian vessels entitled to the advantages set forth in the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, it will immediately be issued. But the Baron will observe that this act is not so extensive as the ordinance for the kingdom of Norway, notified by Count d'Engestrom, inasmuch as the latter expressly provides that "the cargoes may consist of the productions of the soil, or of the industry of any and all countries, without exception," and as it is without limitation of time.

The Secretary of State requests the Baron de Stackelberg to accept the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The BARON DE STACKELBERG, Chargé, &c.

Baron de Stackelberg to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, August 16, 1821.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of His Majesty the King of Sweden and of Norway, has had the honor to receive the note of his Excellency the Secretary of State of the United States, dated the 23d of last month, the substance of which is, that the Government of the United States cannot grant to the Norwegian commerce in their ports the same advantages and immunities which have been granted by the Swedish and Norwegian Government in the ports of Norway to the American commerce, which advantages are stipulated in a note, dated the 25th of January last, addressed by his Excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of Sweden and of Norway, to the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Stockholm; according to which, if the undersigned desire it, the President of the United States has been pleased to consent to issue his proclamation declaring the Norwegian commerce to have a right to enjoy the advantages granted by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815.

In consideration whereof, and in obedience to the orders of the King, his master, the undersigned ought instantly to demand a perfect reciprocity on the part of the United States towards the Norwegian commerce; yet, as the laws of the United States do not appear to have given an extent equivalent to that which has been granted to American commerce in Norway, and until an arrangement can be made upon this subject, it is his duty, officially, to require for the Norwegian commerce the advantage contained in the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, as well as the act of 1st March, 1817, which says: "After the thirtieth day of September next, no goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided, nevertheless, That this regulation shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt, a similar regulation:" consequently, as the American commerce can enter into the ports of Norway with cargoes of the productions of the soil or of manufactures of their country, the undersigned considers the act of navigation in question as being reciprocally applicable to the Norwegian commerce in the ports of the United States.

The undersigned likewise proposes, officially, to the Government of the United States, in order to establish a perfect reciprocity in the commerce between the two countries, to pass a law by which the Norwegian commerce may enjoy in the ports of the said States the same privileges and advantages as have been mentioned in the note of his Excellency the Count d'Engestrom in favor of the American commerce in the ports of the Kingdom of Norway.

The undersigned prays the Secretary of State to be pleased to lay this note before the President of the United States.

The undersigned has the honor to be, &c.
STACKELBERG.

The Secretary of State to Baron de Stackelberg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Aug. 21, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, a copy of a proclamation of the President of the United States, declaring the vessels of Norway to be entitled in the ports of the United States to the benefit of the advantages prescribed by the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815. They will also be entitled, without further proceeding, to those prescribed by the act of 1st March, 1817, as I had the honor of explaining verbally to you its purport.

I pray you, sir, to accept, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The BARON DE STACKELBERG,
Chargé d'Affaires, &c.

GREAT BRITAIN—DUTIES ON IRON.

[Transmitted to Congress, May 3, 1822.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, herewith, to Congress copies of letters received at the Department of State from the Minister of Great Britain, on the subject of the duties discriminating between imported rolled and hammered iron.

I recommend them particularly to the consideration of Congress, believing that although there may be ground for controversy with regard to the application of the engagements of the treaty to the case, yet a liberal construction of those engagements would be compatible at once with a conciliatory and a judicious policy.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1822.

Mr. Antrobus to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22, 1819.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I have been instructed by His Majesty's Government again to bring under your notice the difference of duties levied in the ports of this country on British and other foreign iron in bars and bolts.

It is stipulated by the commercial convention between Great Britain and the United States that articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of Great Britain shall pay no higher duties on importation into the United States than like articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of any other foreign countries.

Mr. Bagot, in a letter of the 18th November, 1816, addressed to Mr. Monroe, at that time Secretary for the Department of State, to which I beg leave to refer you, has clearly pointed out that iron manufactured in Great Britain by rolling ought to be considered a like article to iron manufactured by hammering, both in Sweden and Russia; and I feel confident it is only necessary for me to call your attention to this similarity in the state of the manufacture of British and other foreign iron in bars and bolts, to decide the Government of the United States to adopt measures for the admission to importation of this article on terms more consistent with the spirit of the treaty of commerce existing between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

G. CRAWFURD ANTROBUS.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1820.

SIR: In the month of November of the year 1816, Mr. Bagot had the honor of addressing to Mr. Monroe, at that time Secretary of State, a note calling his attention to a provision of an act of Congress passed on the 27th of April of that year, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," imposing on the importation into the United States of iron in bars and bolts, manufactured by rolling, a duty equal to that paid on anchors; whereas, by it, iron in bars and bolts, manufactured by hammering, was subject to a lower duty.

On the 22d November last, I had the honor to address a note to you on the same subject, requesting the adoption by the American Government of such measures as would give to the British merchant the advantages secured to him by the second article of the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and the United States, namely, "that no higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign countries."

As it is understood that the modification of the tariff thus sought for can only be effected by an act of the Legislature, and as it is believed that the present session of that body is now drawing to a close, I take the liberty of again bringing this matter under your notice and of expressing a hope that the present high rate of duty on the importation of rolled iron will no longer be allowed to exist, to the prejudice of the British manufacturer, and, it would seem, contrary to the spirit of the commercial treaty.

I have the honor to be, &c.

G. CRAWFORD ANTROBUS.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, March 31, 1821.

SIR: It is in obedience to instructions which I have lately received from His Majesty's Government, that I have the honor to recall your attention to a subject of considerable interest, on which Mr. Bagot and Mr. Antrobus have already had occasion, respectively, to open a correspondence with your office—I mean the discrimination established by Congress in the duties on imported iron manufactured by rolling or hammering.

I abstain, for the present, from troubling you with any additional argument in support of the general principles asserted by Mr. Bagot; but as there is reason to suppose that some erroneous notions have prevailed with respect to the process of rolling iron as employed in the British manufactories, it is confidently hoped that an authentic statement of the real process will suffice to remove any objections which the Government of the United States may still entertain to an equalization of the duties in question.

The pig iron is first purified or refined in what is called a finery; during which stage of the process it loses in weight about $2\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. per ton.

The metal thus refined is taken to the puddling furnace, from which, after it has undergone the operation of puddling, it is conveyed in balls, each weighing about sixty pounds, to the slabbing rolls, and there rolled into a slab or rough bar.

The bar is then divided into several pieces, which are placed in piles of three or four pieces together, and, after being again heated in a reverberating furnace, are rolled into what is called a merchant bar.

In these two stages there is a further waste of about 5 cwt. in the ton.

The metal, after being refined in the puddling furnace, is sometimes placed under a helve, or iron hammer of three or four tons weight, and shingled or hammered into what is termed a half bloom, which is subsequently cut into pieces and rolled into a merchant bar, in the same way as the piled slabs. The quality of the manufactured metals, and the cost of the operation, are very nearly the same in both cases.

To these facts, which are derived on authority to all appearance unquestionable, from the principal iron manufactories in England, it may be added that, even the pig iron employed there is probably of a superior quality, owing to the great care with which the dross is drawn off from the ore.

Persuaded that the preceding statement will receive at your hands an attentive and liberal consideration, I beg, sir, that you will accept the assurances with which I have the honor to be, &c.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26, 1821.

SIR: On the 31st of March I did myself the honor of writing to you with reference to the discriminating duties laid by Congress on imported rolled and hammered iron. It is under the special instructions of my Government that I now return to a subject which has been repeatedly pressed upon your notice, in full persuasion that, sooner or later, the Legislature of the United States would recognise the propriety and justice of repealing the exceptionable duty.

I do not feel myself at liberty to draw any inference unfavorable to this expectation from the silence with which you received my former letter. I abstained on that occasion from going at large into the merits of the question, conceiving that an exposition of certain facts, capable of being verified, would be sufficient until the meeting of Congress should furnish a fit occasion for examining the whole subject in a more complete and deliberate manner.

You will remember, sir, that the facts which I then stated, and to which I again solicit your attention, were calculated chiefly to remove the erroneous impressions entertained by some persons in this country with respect to the real nature of British rolled iron, and the process of that manufacture. It had been asserted that, in rolling iron according to the practice of Great Britain, the metal was only twice heated, and so rapidly converted into bars as not to allow of its acquiring those qualities which are supposed to be imparted to it by the more laborious operation of hammering. It now appears, from the testimony of many respectable individuals acquainted with this important branch of industry, that the iron is heated no less than three times; that it is refined with such effect as to lose $7\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. per ton in passing from the state of pig iron to that of merchant bars; and, further, that it is cut into pieces after the first rolling, and piled so as to cross the grain when again heated and rolled.

In the qualities of rolled, as in those of hammered iron, there may be an occasional difference resulting from the nature of the ores employed in its composition. The British ironmasters use a great variety of ores, the different mixtures and combinations of which have, doubtless, a considerable effect in producing a better or an inferior article. But to suppose that any difference is made in the quality or manufacture of British iron when destined for the foreign market, other than when it is kept for home consumption, is an error which cannot be met with too distinct and positive a denial.

This notion, groundless as it is, has, however, been brought forward with others equally erroneous, to prevent an equalization of the duties on imported iron. It has even been alleged that, while rolled iron is exported from Great Britain for the use of foreign countries, the British import large quantities of hammered iron from the north of Europe for their own use; and that, in shipbuilding, this latter article, owing to its superior quality, is indispensable.

In reply to these assertions, I appeal with confidence to the accounts of British and foreign bar iron employed in Great Britain at three successive periods within the last sixteen years. In 1806, in 1814, and in 1820, the respective quantities of the former were 101,877, 137,365, and 136,642; and those of foreign bar iron were 27,411, 11,365, and 6,242. To confirm the results suggested by this statement, it may be added that in Ireland, where a strong prejudice is known to have once prevailed in favor of foreign iron, the consumption, which, in 1807, was 5,690 of British, and 3,229 of foreign, was, in the year 1820, 474 of the latter, and no less than 13,073, of the former.

For the manufacture of steel, and for that alone, the Baltic iron has some advantage over British; and whatever quantity of it is imported into Great Britain is either converted into steel, (in which way it is at present almost exclusively used,) or re-exported to those countries, where the nature and properties of British rolled iron are as yet imperfectly understood.

Concerning the particular point, of shipbuilding, the abstract which follows of the respective quantities of British and foreign iron, employed at different times by His Majesty's Navy Board, must of itself carry conviction to every impartial mind:

Years.	Foreign.	British.
1806	- 457	- 1,343
1810	- 289	- 1,688
1820	- 51	- 1,824

The truth is, that, except for making steel, any superior fitness for which is clearly an accident of nature, and not the effect of hammering, English bar iron is at least equal to that of Sweden and Russia. It is used throughout Great Britain in the most important constructions—in her manufactories, dock-yards, and military establishments. It is prepared exactly in the same manner for exportation as for domestic consumption. It is never finished by a single rolling, except at a very few works, where the metal has been previously formed by hammering. It rarely happens, indeed, that the ironmaster knows, at the time of manufacturing, for which market the iron is destined; and when he is apprized of this circumstance, a sense of his own interest, the interest of the trade, would alone restrain him from sending an inferior manufacture to the foreign market.

It is, in short, the greatest of delusions to imagine that the consumers of iron are interested in giving a preference to the process of hammering over that of rolling. The Baltic manufacturers have, doubtless, their reasons for adhering to their former practice; but so far from their deriving any claim to superiority from that circumstance, it is well known to persons familiar with the trade that their iron would be improved rather than deteriorated by the application of the rolling machine. This being the case, it would be absurd to defend the discriminating duty on the ground of its preventing the manufacture of rolled iron in the northern countries of Europe.

Even in the counter-statements which have been made upon this subject, it is admitted, not only that the ores of England may be equal to those of other countries, but also that the process of rolling only requires to be repeated in order to place it upon a level with that of hammering. Allow me, sir, to remark, in reference to this admission, that, in the present state of your legislative enactments, the British iron imported into the United States might pass under the roller any number of times, without being relieved, on that account, from the pressure of which I complain.

The difference of value or cost at which the rolled and hammered iron may be prepared for sale can surely present no argument in favor of the discriminating duties. That difference, whatever it may be, is a natural result of labor-saving machinery; it is the just reward of ingenuity employed with success in the service of mankind. Science and inventive genius are peculiar to no soil; all nations have an interest in their progress; and to grudge them a fair remuneration would be no less unworthy of the character than foreign to the views of an enlightened Legislature.

I have now, sir, replied, and I trust conclusively, to such parts of the explanatory statement which you communicated to Mr. Antrobus in your letter dated the 31st of May, 1820, as were grounded (how justly I leave to your candor) on the principle of expediency. It remains for me to take a more comprehensive view of the case, as involving, in my belief, a breach of agreement, unintentional no doubt, but not therefore less prejudicial to His Majesty as a contracting party, nor calling the less for a seasonable amendment.

By the second article of the convention of commerce subsisting between the two countries, it is declared that "no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country." To secure certain stipulated advantages reciprocally to both the contracting parties was the general object of the convention; to secure to the produce and manufactures of Great Britain a fair unshackled competition in the markets of the United States with all articles of a similar nature imported from other foreign countries, is the plain, indisputable object of this particular clause. But how can these objects be considered as fully or adequately effected while British bar iron is made to pay on its importation into the United States double the amount of duty levied on the same articles when imported from Sweden and Russia? I am aware of the distinction which has been drawn between rolled and hammered iron, and of the assertion, founded on that distinction, that, so long as all importations of hammered, and all importations of rolled iron are subject, respectively, to the same rate of duty, Great Britain has no right to complain. But Great Britain being the sole exporter of rolled iron, the discriminating duties do in fact operate to her prejudice; and, in point of principle, it will not be difficult to show that the articles in question are truly and essentially like articles, such as cannot, with any color of reason, be excluded from the benefit of the treaty.

You will readily admit, sir, that like articles, in the sense of the convention, must necessarily be such as are similar to each other in their leading and characteristic properties. On any other supposition, the clause in question is an idle form of words, and, contrary to the very end and purpose of the treaty, a door would be opened to arbitrary interpretation in one of its principal provisions. Now, the process or mechanical operation by which an article is manufactured can surely never be reckoned among its properties. Any difference of use or quality resulting from the mode of manufacture may, indeed, constitute a fair ground of distinction; but there is every reason to believe that no such difference exists in the present instance. It has been shown, on the contrary, that, for all the ulterior purposes to which bar iron, as such, is applicable, the rolled is equally good with the hammered; that both the one and the other are sent to market in the same stage of manufacture, and that the only difference between them is one of a retrospective nature, not affecting the identity of their present state, but relating solely to the process by which they were brought to the same point.

To borrow an illustration from language—two words of similar meaning, in common acceptance, would surely not be deemed the less synonymous because they might be traced to different roots, or had passed through different modes of formation.

I further entreat you, sir, to observe with what facility the same distinction may be extended to other articles of commerce. Even the chief staple of your Southern States might, upon the same principle, be discriminated in British ports from the cotton of Brazil or the Levant, for no other reason than because it had been prepared by Mr. Whitney's ingenious and useful machinery. Examples bearing upon either party might easily be multiplied; I have taken this because it is the most obvious. In fact, the same natural productions are common to so many different countries, while the means of improving them are varied according to the vast diversity of local resources, that, even of those articles which barely rank as manufactures, few might not be brought within range of the same distinction which is now applied (unwarrantably, I think) to bar iron. That a latitude of interpretation, thus tending to nullify one of the principal clauses of the treaty, should have been contemplated by those who framed it, is utterly inconceivable. Yet this, sir, is the conclusion to which we must come, if it be admitted that rolled and hammered bar iron are not like articles—an admission which, taking the fair and natural meaning of that phrase, would surely be equivalent to saying that what is bar iron, when hammered, is not bar iron when rolled.

It is with regret, sir, that I have found it necessary to take up so much of your time on this subject; but I feel persuaded that you will appreciate its importance, and that it will receive from the American Government an early and equitable revisal, to the end of relieving, by law, the importations of British rolled iron from the present discriminating duty, and thereby fulfilling the obligations of the commercial treaty.

I embrace this opportunity, sir, to repeat to you the assurance of my perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

JONATHAN RUSSELL—TREATY OF GHENT.

[Communicated to the House, May 7, 1822.]

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 7th of May, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House the letter of Jonathan Russell, Esq., referred to in his Message of the 4th instant, together with such communications as he may have received relative thereto, from any of the other Ministers of the United States who negotiated the Treaty of Ghent," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents called for by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 7, 1822.

STATE DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 7, 1822.

The Secretary of State has the honor of transmitting to the President of the United States his remarks upon the paper deposited at the Department of State on the 22d of last month, by Jonathan Russell, late one of the Plenipotentiaries of the United States, at the negotiation of Ghent, to be communicated to the House of Representatives, as the letter called for by their resolution of the 19th of that month; and the Secretary of State respectfully requests that the President would transmit to the House of Representatives these remarks, together with the above mentioned communication of Mr. Russell, on the renewal of the call therefor by the House.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State.—Private.

PARIS, February 11, 1815.

SIR: In conformity with the intimation contained in my letter of the 25th of December, I now have the honor to state to you the reasons which induced me to differ from a majority of my colleagues on the expediency of offering an article confirming the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the right of the American people to take and cure fish in certain places within the British jurisdiction.

The proposition of such an article appeared to be inconsistent with our reasoning to prove its absolute inutility. According to this reasoning, no new stipulation was any more necessary, on the subject of such an article, than a new stipulation for the recognition of the sovereignty and independence of the United States.

The article proposed appeared also to be inconsistent with our instructions, as interpreted by us, which forbade us to suffer our right to the fisheries to be brought into discussion; for it could not be believed that we were left free to stipulate on a subject which we were restrained from discussing, and that an argument, and not an agreement, was to be avoided. If our construction was indeed correct, it might not, perhaps, be difficult to show that we have not, in fact, completely refrained from the interdicted discussion.

At any rate, the proposal of the article in question was objectionable, inasmuch as it was incompatible with the principles asserted by a majority of the mission, and with the construction which this majority had adopted on that part of our instructions which related to the fisheries. If the majority were correct in these principles, and in this construction, it became us to act accordingly; if they were not correct, still it was unnecessary to add inconsistency to error.

I freely confess, however, that I did not accord with the majority, either in their view of the treaty of 1783, whence they derived their principles, or of our instructions; and that my great objection to proposing the article did not rise from an anxiety to reconcile our conduct with our reasoning and declarations.

I could not believe that the independence of the United States was derived from the treaty of 1783; that the recognition of that independence, by Great Britain, gave to this treaty any peculiar character, or that such character, supposing it existed, would necessarily render this treaty absolutely inseparable in its provisions, and make it one entire and indivisible whole, equally imperishable in all its parts, by any change which might occur in the relations between the contracting parties.

The independence of the United States rests upon those fundamental principles set forth and acted on by the American Congress, in the declaration of July, 1776, and not on any British grant in the treaty of 1783, and its era is dated accordingly.

The treaty of 1783 was merely a treaty of peace, and therefore subject to the same rules of construction as all other compacts of this nature. The recognition of the independence of the United States could not well have given to it a peculiar character, and excepted it from the operation of these rules. Such a recognition, expressed or implied, is, always indispensable on the part of every nation with whom we form any treaty whatsoever. France, in the treaty of alliance, long before the year 1783, not only expressly recognised, but engaged effectually to maintain, this independence; and yet this treaty, so far from being considered as possessing any mysterious peculiarity, by which its existence was perpetuated, has, even without war, and although part of it contained words of perpetuity, and was unexecuted, long since entirely terminated.

Had the recognition of our independence by Great Britain given to the treaty of 1783 any peculiar character, which it did not, still that character could have properly extended to those provisions only which affected that independence. All those general rights, for instance, of jurisdiction, which appertained to the United States, in their quality as a nation, might, so far as that treaty was declaratory of them, have been embraced by such peculiarity, without necessarily extending its influence to mere special commercial liberties and privileges, or to provisions long since executed, not indispensably connected with national sovereignty, or necessarily resulting from it.

The liberty to take and cure fish, within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain, was certainly not necessary to perfect the jurisdiction of the United States; and there is no reason to believe that such a liberty was intended to be raised to an equality with the general right of fishing within the common jurisdiction of all nations, which accrued to us as a member of the great national family. On the contrary, the distinction between the special liberty and the general right appears to have been well understood by the American Ministers who negotiated the treaty of 1783, and to have been clearly marked by the very import of the terms which they employed. It would evidently have been unwise in them, however ingenious it may be in us, to exalt such a privilege to the rank of a sovereign right, and thereby to have assumed the unnecessary and inconvenient obligation of considering such a liberty to be an indispensable condition of our national existence, and thus rendering that existence as precarious as the liberty itself. They could not have considered a privilege, which they expressly made to depend, to a very considerable extent, for its continuance, on events and private interests, as partaking of the character and entitled to the duration of the inherent properties of sovereignty. The settlement of the shores might, at any time, have been effected by the policy of the British Government, and would have made the assent of British subjects, under the influence of that policy, necessary to the continuance of a very considerable portion of that liberty. They could not have meant thus to place, within the control of a foreign Government and its subjects, an integral part, as we now affect to consider this privilege, of our national rights.

It is from this view of the subject that I have been constrained to believe that there was nothing in the treaty of 1783 which could, essentially, distinguish it from ordinary treaties, or rescue it, on account of any peculiarity of character, from the

jura belli, or from the operation of those events on which the continuation or termination of such treaties depends. I was, in like manner, compelled to believe, if any such peculiarity belonged to those provisions, in that treaty, which had an immediate connexion with our independence, that it did not necessarily affect the nature of the whole treaty, or attach to a privilege which had no analogy to such provisions, or any relation to that independence.

I know not, indeed, any treaty, or any article of a treaty, whatever may have been the subject to which it related, or the terms in which it was expressed, that has survived a war between the parties, without being especially renewed, by reference or recital, in the succeeding treaty of peace. I cannot, indeed, conceive of the possibility of such a treaty or such an article; for, however clear and strong the stipulations for perpetuity might be, these stipulations themselves would follow the fate of ordinary unexecuted engagements, and require, after a war, the declared assent of the parties for their revival.

We appear, in fact, not to have had an unequalled confidence in our construction of the treaty of 1783, or to have been willing to rest exclusively on its peculiar character our title to any of the rights mentioned in it, and much less our title to the fishing liberty in question. If hostilities could not affect that treaty, or abrogate its provisions, why did we permit the boundaries assigned by it to be brought into discussion, or stipulate for a restitution of all places taken from us during the present war? If such restitution was secured by the mere operation of the treaty of 1783, why did we discover any solicitude for the status ante bellum, and not resist the principle uti possidetis on that ground?

With regard to the fishing privilege, we distinctly stated to you, in our letter of the 21st of December, that, "at the time of the treaty of 1783, it was no new grant, we having always before that time enjoyed it," and thus endeavored to derive our title to it from prescription. A title, derived from immemorial usage, antecedent to 1783, could not well owe its origin or its validity to a compact concluded at that time; and we could, therefore, in this view of the subject, correctly say that this privilege is no new grant; that is, that our right to the exercise of it was totally independent of such compact. If we were well founded, however, in the assertion of our prescriptive title, it was quite unnecessary to attempt to give a kind of charmed existence to the treaty of 1783, and to extend its undefinable influence to every article of which it was composed, merely to preserve that title, which we declared to be in no way derived from it, and which had existed, and of course could exist, without it.

It was rather unfortunate, too, for our argument against a severance of the provisions of that treaty, that we should have discovered, ourselves, a radical difference between them, making the fishing privilege depend on immemorial usage, and of course distinct in its nature and origin from the rights resulting from our independence.

We, indeed, throw some obscurity over this subject when we declare to you that this privilege was always enjoyed by us before the treaty of 1783; thence inferring that it was not granted by that treaty, and in the same sentence and from the same fact, appear also to infer, that it was not to be forfeited by war any more than any other of the rights of our independence, making it thus one of these rights, and of course, according to our doctrine, dependant on that treaty. There might have been nothing incomprehensible in this mode of reasoning had the treaty recognised this privilege to be derived from prescription, and confirmed it on that ground. The treaty has, however, not the slightest allusion to the past, in reference to this privilege, but regards it only with a view to the future. The treaty, therefore, cannot be construed as supporting a pre-existing title, but as containing a grant entirely new. If we claim, therefore, under the treaty, we must renounce prescription, and if we claim from prescription, we can derive no aid from the treaty. If the treaty be imperishable in all its parts, the fishing privilege remains unimpaired without a recurrence to immemorial usage; and if our title to it be well founded on immemorial usage, the treaty may perish without affecting it. To have endeavored to support it on both grounds implies that we had not entire confidence in either, and to have proposed a new article, indicates a distrust of both.

It is not, as I conceive, difficult to show that we cannot, indeed, derive a better title to this fishing privilege from prescription than from any indestructible quality of the treaty of 1783.

Prescription appears to me to be inapplicable to the parties and to the subject, and to be defective both in fact and effect. As to the parties, the immemorial enjoyment of a privilege within British jurisdiction, by British subjects, the inhabitants of British colonies, could not well be considered as evidence of a title to that privilege claimed by the citizens of an independent republic, residing within the exclusive jurisdiction of that republic.

The people of the United States, as such, could have claimed no special privilege within the dominions of any foreign Power from immemorial usage, in 1783, when the longest duration of their own existence in that quality was little more, at the utmost, than the brief period of seven years, which is surely not beyond the memory of man, (ultra memoriam hominis.) The people of the United States had never, in fact, during that period, enjoyed the fishing privilege a moment, being effectually prevented therefrom by the existing state of hostilities. Nor could the inhabitants of the colonies originally constituting the United States, even in their colonial condition, acquire against their sovereign any right from long usage or mere lapse of time, (nullum tempus regi occurrit.) The British sovereign was always competent to regulate and restrain his colonies in their commerce and intercourse with each other, whenever and however he might think proper; and had he forbidden his subjects in the province of Massachusetts to fish, and dry and cure fish, in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador, which, by the way, had not immemorially belonged to him, it is not to be imagined that they would have conceived themselves discharged from the obligation of submitting on account of any pretended right from immemorial usage. The fishing privilege, therefore, enjoyed by British subjects within British jurisdiction, could give no permanent and independent right to those subjects themselves, and, a fortiori, no such right to the citizens of the United States, claiming under a different estate and in a different capacity. Great Britain might, indeed, as well prescribe for the prerogatives of her sovereignty over us, as we for any of the privileges which we enjoyed as her subjects.

I do not think it necessary to inquire how far the practice of the people of Massachusetts was the practice of the whole original thirteen United States, or of the United States now, including Louisiana, or how far the immemorial usage of the people of Boston can establish a prescriptive right in the people of New Orleans. I trust I have said enough to show that prescription is inapplicable to the parties. It is, also, I conceive, inapplicable to the subject.

Had the United States, as an independent nation, enjoyed, from time immemorial, the fishing privilege in question, still, from the nature of this privilege, no prescriptive right could have thence been established. A right to fish, or to trade, or to do any other act or thing within the exclusive jurisdiction of a foreign State, is a simple power, a right of mere ability, (jus mera facultatis,) depending on the will of such State, and is consequently imprescriptible. An independent title can be derived only from treaty.

I conceive, therefore, that our claim to the fishing privilege, from immemorial usage, is not only unsupported by the fact, but cannot, in effect, result from such usage.

I have, from this view of the subject, been led to conclude, that the treaty of 1783, in relation to the fishing liberty, is abrogated by the war; that this liberty is totally destitute of support from prescription; and that we are, consequently, left without any title to it whatsoever. For I cannot prevail upon myself to seek for such a title in the relative situation of the parties, at the time of negotiating the treaty of 1783, and contend, according to the insinuation contained in our letter to you of the 21st of December, that the jurisdiction of Great Britain over the colonies, assigned to her in America, was a grant from the United States, and that the United States, in making this grant, reserved to themselves the privilege in question. Such a pretension, however lofty, is so inconsistent with the circumstances of the case, and with any sober construction which can be given to that treaty, that I shall, I trust, be excused from seriously examining its validity.

Having thus stated some of the reasons which induced me to differ in opinion from a majority of my colleagues, relative to the character of the treaty of 1783, as well as with regard to every other foundation on which they were disposed to rest our title to the fishing privilege, I shall now proceed to explain the causes which influenced me to dissent from them in the interpretation of our instructions. These instructions forbid us to permit our rights to the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, to the fisheries, and to Louisiana, to be brought into discussion. I conceived that this prohibition extended to the general rights only, which affected our sovereignty, and resulted from it, and not to mere special liberties and privileges which had no relation to that sovereignty, either as to its nature or extent.

The right relating to the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, was the right which belonged to us as an independent nation, in common with all other independent nations, and not the permission of trading to those parts of the East Indies which were within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain. In like manner the right to the fisheries, contemplated by our instructions, was, I conceived, the right common to all nations, to use the open sea for fishing as well as for navigation, and not to the liberty to fish and cure fish within the territorial limits of any foreign State. The right to Louisiana, which was not to be brought into discussion, was the right to the empire and domain of that region, and not to the right of excluding Great Britain from the navigation of the Mississippi.

How far we conformed to this instruction, with regard to the general right to Louisiana, it is not necessary for me here to inquire; but certainly the majority believed themselves permitted to offer a very explicit proposition with regard to the navigation of its principal river. I believed, with them, that we were so permitted, and that we were likewise permitted to offer a proposition relative to the fishing liberty, and, had the occasion required it, to make proposals concerning the trade to the British East Indies. I was persuaded that treating relative to these privileges, or discussing the obligation or expediency of granting or withholding them, respectively, violated in no way our instructions, or affected the general rights which we were forbidden to bring into discussion. Considering, therefore, the fishing liberty to be entirely at an end without a new stipulation for its revival, and believing that we were entirely free to discuss the terms and conditions of such a stipulation, I did not object to the article proposed by us because any article on the subject was unnecessary or contrary to our instructions; but I objected specially to that article because, conceding in it the free navigation of the Mississippi, we offered, in my estimation, for the fishing privilege, a price much above its value.

In no view of the subject could I discover any analogy between the two objects; and the only reason for connecting them, and making them mutual equivalents for each other, appeared to be because they were both found in the treaty of 1783.

If that treaty was abrogated by the war, (as I consider it to have been,) any connexion between its parts must have ceased, and the liberty of navigating the Mississippi by British subjects must, at least, be completely at an end; for it will not, I trust, be attempted to continue it by a prescriptive title, or to consider it as a reservation made by the United States from any grant of sovereignty which, at the treaty of peace, they accorded to Great Britain. If, indeed, it was such a reservation, it must have been intended for our benefit, and of course could be no equivalent for the fishing privilege. If it is considered as a reservation made by Great Britain, it will reverse the facts assumed by us in relation to that privilege.

The third article of the treaty of 1783, respecting the fisheries, and the eighth article of that treaty, respecting the Mississippi, had not the slightest reference to each other, and were placed as remote the one from the other as the limits of that treaty could well admit. Whatever, therefore, was the cause of inserting the fishing liberty, whether it was a voluntary and gratuitous grant on the part of Great Britain, or extorted from her as a condition on which the peace depended, it could have had no relation to the free navigation of the Mississippi. Besides, the article relative to this river must, from the evident views of the parties at the time, from their supposed relations to each other, and from their known relations to a third Power, as to this river, have been considered of mutual and equal advantage, and furnished no subject for compensation or adjustment in any other provision of that treaty. Both parties believed that this river touched the territories of both, and that, of course, both had a right to its navigation. As Spain possessed both banks of this river, to a considerable distance from its mouth, and one of its banks nearly throughout its whole extent, both parties had an interest in uniting to prevent that Power from obstructing its navigation. Had not the article been intended to engage the parties in relation to Spain, they would, probably, have limited it to the navigation of the river as far as their own territories extended on it, and not have stipulated for its navigation to the ocean, which necessarily carried it through the exclusive territories of Spain.

If the circumstances had been, in fact, such as the parties at the time believed them to be, and with a view to which they acted; or had these circumstances subsequently experienced no radical change, Great Britain would have gained now no more than she would have granted by the revival of the article in relation to the Mississippi, and would not, any more than in 1783, have acknowledged any equivalent to be conferred by it for our liberty relative to the fisheries. The circumstances, however, assumed by the parties at the time, in relation to Great Britain, and from which her rights were deduced, have not only in part been discovered not to have existed, but those which did exist have been entirely changed by subsequent events. It has been ascertained that the territories assigned to Great Britain no where, in fact, reached the Mississippi; and the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States has forever removed the Spanish jurisdiction from that river. The whole consideration, therefore, on the part of Great Britain, whether derived from her territorial rights, or from her part of the reciprocal obligations relative to Spain, having entirely failed, our engagements entered into on account of that consideration may be fairly construed to have terminated with it.

In this view of the subject, Great Britain could have had no title to the navigation of the Mississippi, even if a war had not taken place between the parties. To renew, therefore, the claims of Great Britain under that article, subject to this construction, would be granting her nothing; and to renew that article independent of this construction, and without any reference to the circumstances that attended its origin, in 1783, or to the events which have since occurred in relation to it, would be granting her advantages not only entirely unilateral, as it relates to the article itself, but, I believe, of much greater importance than any which we could derive from the liberty relative to the fisheries.

If the article which we offered merely intended to rescue the third and eighth articles of the treaty of 1783 from the operation of the present war, and to continue them precisely as they were immediately prior to this war, (the third article being then in full force, and the eighth article being no longer obligatory,) we should have attempted to exchange, like General Drummond, the dead for the living.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the British Government should, in suspecting such an intention, have rejected our proposition. I was opposed, however, to making the proposition, not only because I was convinced that it was offered with no such intention, but because I believed it would give to Great Britain the free navigation of the Mississippi, under circumstances, and evidently for an object, which would place it on very distinct grounds from those on which it was placed by the treaty of 1783.

The whole of the Mississippi being now exclusively within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States, a simple renewal of the British right to navigate it would place that right beyond the reach of the war, and of every other previous circumstance which might have impaired or terminated it; and the power to grant on our part being now complete, the right to enjoy on hers, under our grant, must be complete also.

It would be absurd to suppose that any thing impossible was intended, and that Great Britain was to be allowed to navigate the Mississippi precisely as she could have navigated it immediately after the treaty of 1783; as if her territories extended to it; and as if Spain was in entire possession of one of its banks and of a considerable portion of the other. The revival of the British right to navigate the Mississippi would be, under existing circumstances, a new and complete grant to her, measured by these circumstances, and thence embracing not only the entire freedom of the whole extent of that river, but the unrestrained access to it across our territories. If we did not intend this, we intended nothing which Great Britain could accept; and whatever else might have been intended, if not at once rejected by her, would hereafter have been the subject of new and endless controversy. When, however, we connected the revival of the navigation of the Mississippi with the revival of the liberty of taking and curing fish within the British jurisdiction, (two things which never before had any relation to each other,) we evidently meant, if we acted in good faith, not only to concede as well as to obtain something, but also to be understood as conceding an equivalent for what we obtained. In thus offering the navigation of the Mississippi, and the access to it through our territories, as an equivalent for the fishing liberty, we not only placed both on ground entirely different from that in which they respectively stood in the treaty of 1783, and acted somewhat inconsistently with our own reasoning relative to the origin and immortality of the latter; but we offered to concede much more than we could hope to gain by the arrangement, with whatever view its comparative effects might be estimated.

From the year 1783 to the commencement of the present war, the actual advantages derived from the fishing privilege by the people of the United States were, according to the best information that I can obtain on the subject, very inconsiderable, and annually experiencing a voluntary diminution.

It was discovered that the obscurity and humidity of the atmosphere, owing to almost incessant fogs in the high northern latitudes, where this privilege was chiefly located, prevented the effectual curing of fish in those regions, and, consequently, lessened very much the value of the liberty of taking them there. By far the greatest part of the fish taken by our fishermen before the present war was caught in the open sea or upon our own coasts, and cured upon our own shores. This branch of the fisheries has been found to be inexhaustible, and has been pursued with so much more certainty and despatch than the privileged portion within the British jurisdiction, that it has not only been generally preferred by our fishermen, but would probably, on longer experience, have been almost universally used by them. It was to be believed, therefore, that a discontinuance of the privilege of taking and curing fish within the British jurisdiction would not at all diminish the aggregate quantity taken by the people of the United States, or very materially vary the details of the business. That part of the fisheries which would still have belonged to us as a nation (being exhaustless) would afford an ample field for all the capital and industry hitherto employed in the general business of fishing, or merchandise of fish; and on that field might the few fishermen who had hitherto used the liberty of taking and curing fish within the jurisdiction of Great Britain exert their skill and labor without any serious inconvenience. This liberty, liable, in a very considerable degree, by the terms in which it was granted, to be curtailed by the Government and subjects of a foreign State; already growing into voluntary disuse by our own citizens, on account of the difficulties inseparable from it; and absolutely incapable of extension, was totally unnecessary to us for subsistence or occupation, and afforded in no way any commercial facility or political advantage. This privilege, too, while it was thus of little or no utility to us, cost Great Britain literally nothing.

The free navigation of the Mississippi, with the necessary access to it, is a grant of a very different character. If it was not heretofore used by Great Britain, it was, perhaps, because she did not consider herself entitled to it, or because the circumstances of the moment suspended its practical utility. The treaty of 1783 stipulated for her the navigation of this river, under the presumption that her territories extended to it; and, of course, could not intend to give her an access to it through our territories. The British possessions to the westward of Lake Erie being almost entirely unsettled, rendered, perhaps, the free navigation of the Mississippi, for the moment, of little advantage to her, particularly as her right to reach it was at least equivocal, and as, by another treaty, she could carry on trade with our Indians.

This navigation might, indeed, for a long time to come, be of little use to her for all the legitimate purposes of transit and intercourse; but every change that could take place in this respect must increase its importance to her; while every change in the fishing liberty would be to the disadvantage of the United States.

The freedom of the Mississippi, however, is not to be estimated by the mere legitimate uses that would be made of it. The unrestrained and undefined access which would have been inferred from the article which we proposed, would have placed in the hands of Great Britain and her subjects all the facilities of communication with our own citizens, and with the Indians inhabiting the immense regions of our Western territory. It is not in the nature of things that these facilities should not have been abused for unrighteous purposes. A vast field for contraband and intrigue would have been laid open, and our Western territories would have been swarmed with British smugglers and British emissaries. The revenue would have been defrauded by the illicit introduction of English merchandise; and the lives of our citizens, and the security of a valuable portion of our country, exposed to Indian hostilities, excited by an uncontrolled British influence. If our instructions to guard against such an influence forbade us to renew the British liberty to trade with our Indians, we certainly violated the spirit of those instructions in offering the means of exercising that influence with still greater facility and effect than could result from that liberty.

What was there in the fishing liberty, either of gain to us, or loss to Great Britain, to warrant, in consideration of it, a grant to her of such means of fraud and annoyance? What justice or equality was there in exposing to all the horrors of savage warfare the unoffending citizens of an immense tract of territory, not at all benefited by the fishing privilege, merely to provide for the doubtful accommodation of a few fishermen, in a remote quarter, entirely exempt from the danger?

Such have been the reasons which induced me to differ from a majority of my colleagues with regard to the article in question, and which, I trust, will be thought sufficient at least to vindicate my motives.

The unfeigned respect which I feel for the integrity, talents, and judgment of those gentlemen would restrain me from opposing them on slight grounds; and a deference for their opinions makes me almost fear that I have erred in dissenting from them on the present occasion. I can but rejoice, however, that the article as proposed by us was rejected by Great Britain, whatever were her reasons for rejecting it: whether, as above suggested, she suspected some tacit reservation, or want of faith on our part; or supposed, from the price we at once bade for the fishing privilege, that we overrated its value, and might concede for it even more than the navigation of the Mississippi, with all its accessory advantages.

We are still at liberty to negotiate for that privilege in a treaty of commerce, should it be found expedient, and to offer for it an equivalent fair in its comparative value, and just in its relative effects. In any other way, I trust, we shall not consent to purchase its renewal.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect, sir, your faithful and obedient servant,

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

My argument to demonstrate the abrogation of the treaty of 1783 by the present war, and the consequent discontinuance of the fishing privilege will, I trust, not be ascribed to any hostility to those who were interested in that privilege. I have been always ready, and am still ready, to make every sacrifice for the preservation of that privilege which its nature and utility can justify; but I have conscientiously believed that the free navigation of the Mississippi was pregnant with too much mischief to be offered indirectly, under our construction of the treaty, or directly, as a new equivalent for the liberty of taking and curing fish within the British jurisdiction.

We had three other ways of proceeding:

First. To contend for the indestructibility of the treaty of 1783; thence inferring the continuance of the fishing privilege, without saying any thing about the navigation of the Mississippi, which would have reserved our right of contesting this navigation on the grounds I have mentioned as specially applicable to it.

Secondly. To have considered the treaty at an end, and to have offered a reasonable equivalent (wherever it might be found) for the fishing privilege.

Thirdly. To have made this liberty a sine qua non of peace, as embraced by the principle of status ante bellum.

To either of these propositions I would have assented; but I could not consent to grant or revive the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi in order to procure or preserve the fishing liberty.

[DUPLICATE.]

PARIS, February 11, 1815.

SIR: In conformity with the intimation contained in my letter of the 25th December, I have now the honor to state to you the reasons which have induced me to differ from a majority of my colleagues on the expediency of offering an article confirming the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the right of the American people to take and cure fish in certain places within the British jurisdiction.

The proposal of such an article appeared to be inconsistent with our reasoning to prove its absolute inutility.

According to this reasoning, no new stipulation was any more necessary, on the subject of such an article, than a new stipulation for the recognition of the sovereignty and independence of the United States.

The article proposed appeared, also, to be inconsistent with our instructions, as interpreted by us, which forbade us to suffer our right to the fisheries to be brought into discussion; for, it could not be believed that we were left free to stipulate on a subject which we were restrained from discussing, and that an argument, and not an agreement, was to be avoided.

If our construction was, indeed, correct, it might not, perhaps, be difficult to show that we have not, in fact, completely refrained from the interdicted discussion.

At any rate, the proposal of the article in question was objectionable, inasmuch as it was incompatible with the principles asserted by a majority of the mission, and with the construction which that majority had adopted on that part of our instructions which related to the fisheries. If the majority were correct in these principles and in this construction, it became us to act accordingly; if they were incorrect, still it was unnecessary to add inconsistency to error.

I freely confess, however, that I did not accord with the majority, either in their views of the treaty of 1783, whence they derive their principles, nor of our instructions; and that my great objection to proposing the article did not arise from an anxiety to reconcile our conduct with our reasoning and declarations.

I could not believe that the independence of the United States was derived from the treaty of 1783; that the recognition of that independence by Great Britain gave to this treaty any peculiar character; or that such character, supposing it existed, would necessarily render this treaty absolutely inseparable in its provisions, and make it one entire and indivisible whole, equally imperishable in all its parts, by any change which might occur in the relations between the contracting parties.

The independence of the United States rests upon those fundamental principles set forth and acted on by the American Congress in the declaration of July, 1776, and not on any British grant in the treaty of 1783; and its era is dated accordingly.

The treaty of 1783 was merely a treaty of peace, and therefore subject to the same rules of construction as all other compacts of this nature. The recognition of the independence of the United States could not well have given to it a peculiar character, and excepted it from the operation of these rules. Such a recognition, expressed or implied, is always indispensable on the part of every nation with whom we form any treaty whatsoever. France, in the Treaty of Alliance, long before the year 1783, not only expressly recognised, but engaged effectually to maintain this independence; and yet this treaty, so far from being considered as possessing any mysterious peculiarity by which its existence was perpetuated, has, even without war, and although a part of it contained words of perpetuity and was unexecuted, long since terminated.

Had the recognition of our independence by Great Britain given to the treaty of 1783 any peculiar character, (which it did not,) yet that character could have properly extended to those provisions only which affected that independence. All these general rights, for instance, of jurisdiction, which appertained to the United States in their quality as a nation, might, so far as that treaty was declaratory of them, have been embraced by that peculiarity, without necessarily extending its influence to mere special liberties and privileges, or to provisions long since executed, not indispensably connected with national sovereignty, nor necessarily resulting from it.

The liberty to take and cure fish within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain, was certainly not necessary to perfect the jurisdiction of the United States. And there is no reason to believe that such a liberty was intended to be raised to an equality with the general right of fishing within the common jurisdiction of all nations, which accrued to us as a member of the great national family. On the contrary, the distinction between the special liberty and the general right appears to have been well understood by the American Ministers who negotiated the treaty of 1783, and to have been clearly marked by the very import of the terms which they employed. It would evidently have been unwise in them, however ingenious it may be in us, to exalt such a privilege to the rank of a sovereign right, and thereby to have assumed the unnecessary and inconvenient obligation of considering such a liberty to be an indispensable condition of our national existence, and thus rendering that existence as precarious as the liberty itself. They could not have considered a privilege which they expressly made to depend, to a very considerable extent, for its continuance, on mere events and private interests, as partaking of the character and entitled to the duration of the inherent properties of sovereignty. The settlement of the shores might at any time have been effected by the policy of the British Government, and would have made the assent of British subjects, under the influence of that policy, necessary to the continuance of a very considerable portion of that privilege. They could not have meant thus to place within the control of a foreign Power and its subjects an integral part, as we now affect to consider this privilege, of our national rights.

It is from this view of the subject that I have been constrained to believe that there was nothing in the treaty of 1783 which could essentially distinguish it from ordinary treaties, or rescue it, on account of any peculiarity of character, from the jura belli, or from the operation of those events on which the continuance or termination of such treaties depends.

I was, in like manner, compelled to believe, if any such peculiarity belonged to those provisions in that treaty, which had an immediate connexion with our independence, that it did not necessarily affect the nature of the whole treaty, nor attach to a privilege which had no analogy to such provisions, nor any relation to that independence.

I know not, indeed, any treaty, nor any article of a treaty, whatever may have been the subject to which it related, or the terms in which it was expressed, that has survived a war between the parties, without being specially renewed, by reference or recital, in the succeeding treaty of peace. I cannot, indeed conceive the possibility of such a treaty, or of such an article; for, however clear and strong the stipulations for perpetuity might be, these stipulations themselves would follow the fate of ordinary unexecuted engagements, and require, after a war, the declared assent of the parties for their revival.

We appear, in fact, not to have an unqualified confidence in our construction of the treaty of 1783, or to have been willing to rest exclusively on its peculiar character our title to any of the rights mentioned in it, and much less our title to the fishing privilege in question.

If hostilities could not affect that treaty, nor abrogate its provisions, why did we permit the boundaries assigned by it to be brought into the discussion, or stipulate for a restoration of all places taken from us during the present war? If such a restitution was secured by the mere operation of the treaty of 1783, why did we discover any solicitude for the status ante bellum, and not resist the principle of uti possidetis on that ground?

With regard to the fishing privilege, we distinctly stated to you, in our letter of the 25th of December last, that, at the time of the treaty of 1783, it was no new grant, we having always before that time enjoyed it, and thus endeavored to derive our title to it from prescription. A title derived from immemorial usage, antecedent to 1783, could not well owe its origin or validity to any compact concluded at that time; and we might, therefore, in this view of the subject, correctly say that this privilege was then no new grant; that is, that our right to the exercise of it was totally independent of such compact. If we were well founded, however, in the assertion of our prescriptive title, it was quite unnecessary for us to attempt to give a kind of charmed existence to the treaty of 1783, and to extend its indefinable influence to every article of which it was composed, merely to preserve that title which we declared to be derived from it, and which had existed, and of course could exist, without it.

It was rather unfortunate, too, for our argument against the severance of the provisions of that treaty, that we should have discovered ourselves such a radical difference between them, making the fishing privilege to depend on immemorial usage, and of course distinct, in its nature and in its origin, from the rights resulting from our independence.

Jonathan Russell—Treaty of Ghent.

We indeed throw some obscurity over this subject, when we declare to you that this privilege was always enjoyed by us before the treaty of 1783, thence inferring that it was not granted by that treaty; and, in the same sentence, and from the same fact, appear also to infer that it was not to be forfeited by war, any more than any other of the rights of independence; making it thus one of those rights, and, of course, according to our doctrine, dependent on that treaty. There might have been nothing incomprehensible in this mode of reasoning, had the treaty recognised this privilege to be derived from prescription, and confirmed it on that ground. The treaty, however, has not the slightest allusion to the past, in reference to this privilege, but regards it only with a view to the future. The treaty cannot, therefore, be construed as supporting a pre-existing title, but as containing a grant entirely new. If we claim, therefore, under the treaty, we must renounce prescription; and if we claim from prescription, we can derive no aid from the treaty. If the treaty be imperishable in all its parts, the fishing privilege remains unimpaired, without a recurrence to immemorial usage; and if our title to it be well founded on immemorial usage, the treaty may perish without affecting it. To have endeavored to support it on both grounds implies that we had not entire confidence in either; and to have proposed a new article, indicates a distrust of both.

It is not, as I conceive, difficult to show that we can, indeed, derive no better title to this fishing privilege from prescription, than from any indisstructible quality of the treaty of 1783.

Prescription appears to be inapplicable to the parties and to the subject, and to be defective both in fact and effect.

As to the parties: the immemorial enjoyment of a privilege, within British jurisdiction, by British subjects, the inhabitants of British colonies, could not well be considered as evidence of a title to that privilege claimed by citizens of an independent Republic, residing within the exclusive jurisdiction of that Republic. The people of the United States, as such, could have claimed no special privilege within the dominions of any foreign Power, from immemorial usage, in 1783, when the longest duration of their own existence in that quality was little more, at the utmost, than the brief period of seven years, which is surely not beyond the memory of man, (ultra memoriam hominis.) The people of the United States had never, in fact, during that period, enjoyed the fishing privilege a moment, being effectually prevented therefrom by the existing state of hostilities. Nor could the inhabitants of the colonies, originally constituting the United States, even in their colonial condition, acquire against their sovereign any right from long usage, or the mere lapse of time, (nullum tempus regi occurrit.) The British sovereign was always competent to regulate or to restrain them in their commerce and intercourse with each other, whenever and however he might think proper. And had he forbidden his subjects in the province of Massachusetts Bay to fish, and to dry and cure fish, in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador, (which, by the way, had not immemorially belonged to him,) it is not to be imagined that they would have conceived themselves discharged from the obligation of submitting, on account of any pretended right from immemorial usage.

The fishing privilege, therefore, enjoyed by British subjects within British jurisdiction, could give no permanent and independent right to those subjects themselves, and, a fortiori, no such right to the citizens of the United States, claiming under a different estate and in a different capacity. Great Britain might, indeed, as well prescribe for the prerogative of her sovereignty over us, as we for any of the privileges which we enjoyed as her subjects.

I do not think it necessary to inquire how far the practice of the people of Massachusetts was the practice of the people of the whole original thirteen United States, or of the United States, now including Louisiana; or how far the immemorial usage of the people of Boston can establish a prescriptive right in the people of New Orleans. I trust I have said enough to show that prescription is inapplicable to the parties.

It is also, I conceive, inapplicable to the subject. Had the United States, as an independent nation, enjoyed from time immemorial the fishing privilege in question, still, from the nature of this privilege, no prescriptive right would have thence been established. A right to fish, or to trade, or to do any other thing, within the exclusive jurisdiction of a foreign State, is a simple power, a right of mere ability, (jus mera facultatis,) depending on the will of such State, and, consequently, imprescriptible. An independent right can be derived only from treaty.

I conceive, therefore, that a claim to the fishing privilege from immemorial usage is not only unsupported by the fact, but cannot, in effect, result from such usage.

I have, in this view of the subject, been led to conclude that the treaty of 1783, in relation to the fishing liberty, is abrogated by the war; and that this liberty is totally destitute of support from prescription; and, consequently, that we are left without any title to it whatsoever: for, I cannot prevail upon myself to seek for such a title in the relative situation of the parties at the time of negotiating the treaty of 1783, and contend, according to the insinuation contained in our letter to you of the 25th December last, that the jurisdiction of Great Britain over the colonies assigned to her, in America, was a grant of the United States; and that the United States, in making this grant, reserved to themselves the privilege in question. Such a pretension, however lofty, is so inconsistent with the real circumstances of the case, and with any sober construction which can be given to that treaty, that I shall, I trust, be excused from seriously examining its validity.

Having thus stated some of the reasons which induced me to differ in opinion from a majority of my colleagues, relative to the character of the treaty of 1783, as well as with regard to every other foundation on which they were disposed inconsistently to rest our title to the fishing privilege, I shall now proceed to explain the reasons which influenced me to dissent from them in the interpretation of our instructions relative to their privilege.

These instructions forbade us to permit our rights to the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, to the fisheries, and to Louisiana, to be brought into discussion. I conceived that this prohibition extended to the general rights only, which affected our sovereignty and resulted from it; and not to the special liberties and privileges, which had no relation to that sovereignty, either as to its nature or extent.

The right relative to the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope was the right which belonged to us as an independent nation, and not to the permission of trading to those parts of the East Indies which were within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain. In like manner, the right to the fisheries, contemplated by our instructions, was, I conceive, the right to use the open sea for fishing as well as for navigation; and not the liberty to fish, and to cure fish, within the territorial limits of any foreign State. The right to Louisiana, which, by those instructions, was not to be brought into discussion, was the right to the empire and domain of that region, and not the right of excluding Great Britain from the free navigation of the Mississippi.

How far we conformed to this instruction, with regard to the general right to Louisiana, it is not necessary for me here to inquire; but, certainly, the majority believed themselves to be permitted (their own construction to the contrary notwithstanding) to offer a very explicit proposition, with regard to the navigation of its principal river. Now, this offer I considered, for the reasons just suggested, not to be a violation of the instructions in question, but I considered it to be against both the letter and the spirit of our other instructions of the 15th of April, 1813. By these instructions we were explicitly and implicitly directed "to avoid any stipulation which might restrain the United States from excluding the British traders from the navigation of the lakes and rivers, exclusively within our own jurisdiction." This instruction applied with the greater force to the Mississippi, because, as it is believed, it was the only river to which it could apply.

While I believed, therefore, that we were permitted to offer a proposition, relative to the fishing liberty; and that, in treating concerning this liberty, or in discussing our claim to it, we in no way violated our instructions, nor affected the general rights which we were forbidden to bring into discussion; I did believe, and do still believe, that we were expressly and unequivocally forbidden to offer or to renew a stipulation for the free navigation, by the British, of the Mississippi—a river within our exclusive jurisdiction.

Considering, therefore, the fishing liberty to be entirely at an end, without a new stipulation for its revival, and believing that we were entirely free to discuss the terms and conditions of such a stipulation, I did not object to the article proposed by us because any article on the subject was necessary, or contrary to our instructions, but I objected specially to that article, because, by conceding in it to Great Britain the free navigation of the Mississippi, we not only directly violated our instructions, but we offered, in my estimation, a price much above its value, and which could not justly be given.

In no view of the subject could I discover any analogy or relation between the two objects; and the only reason for connecting them, and making them mutual equivalents for each other, appeared to be, because they were both found in the treaty of 1783. If that treaty was abrogated by the war, as I consider it to have been, any connexion between its parts must have ceased, and the liberty of navigating the Mississippi by British subjects must, at least, be completely at an end; for it will not, I trust, be attempted to continue it by a prescriptive title, or to consider it as a reservation made by the United States from any grant of sovereignty, which, at the treaty of peace, they accorded to Great Britain. If, indeed, it were such a reservation, it must have been intended for our benefit; and, of course, no equivalent for the fishing privilege, likewise for our benefit. If it is considered as a reservation made by Great Britain, it will reverse all the facts assumed by us in relation to that privilege.

The third article of the treaty of 1783, respecting the fisheries, and the eighth of that treaty, respecting the Mississippi, had not the slightest reference to each other, and were placed as remote the one from the other as the limits of that treaty could well admit. Whatever, therefore, might have been the cause of inserting the fishing liberty, whether it was a voluntary and gratuitous grant on the part of Great Britain, or extorted from her as a condition on which the peace depended, it could have had no relation with the free navigation of the Mississippi. Besides, the article relative to this river must, from the evident views of the parties at the time, from their relations to each other, and from their known relations to a third Power, have been considered of mutual and equal advantage, and furnished no subject for compensation or adjustment in any other provision of that treaty.

Both parties believed that this river touched the territories of both, and that, of course, both had a right to its navigation. As Spain possessed both banks of this river to a considerable distance from its mouth, and one of its banks nearly throughout its whole extent, both parties had an interest in uniting to prevent that Power from obstructing its navigation. Had not the article been intended to engage the parties in relation to Spain, they probably would have limited it to the navigation of the river, so far as their own territories extended on it, and not have stipulated for its navigation to the ocean, which necessarily carried it through the exclusive territories of Spain. If the circumstances had been, in fact, such as the parties at the time believed them to be, and with a view to which they acted, or had these circumstances subsequently experienced no radical change, Great Britain would have gained now no more than she would have granted by the renewal of the article in relation to the navigation of the Mississippi; and would not, any more than in 1783, have acknowledged any equivalent to be conferred by it, for our liberty relative to the fisheries. The circumstances, however, assumed by the parties at the time, in relation to Great Britain, and from which her rights were deduced, have not only in part been since discovered not to have existed, but those which did exist have been entirely changed by subsequent events.

It has been clearly ascertained that the territories assigned to Great Britain nowhere, in fact, reached the Mississippi; and the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States had forever removed the Spanish jurisdiction from that river. The whole consideration, therefore, on the part of Great Britain, whether derived from her territorial rights, or from her part of the reciprocal obligations relative to Spain, having entirely failed, our engagements entered into on account of that consideration may be fairly construed to have terminated with it.

In this view of the subject, Great Britain could have had no title to the navigation of the Mississippi, even if a war had not taken place between the parties. To renew, therefore, the claims of Great Britain under that article, subject to this construction, would be granting her nothing; and, to renew that article independent of this construction, and without any reference to the circumstances that attended its origin in 1783, or to the events which have since occurred in relation to it, would be granting her advantages not only entirely unilateral, as relates to the article itself, but, as I believed, of much greater importance than any which we could derive from the liberty relative to the fisheries.

If the article which we offered was merely intended to rescue the third and eighth articles of the treaty of 1783 from the operation of the present war, and to continue them precisely as they were immediately prior to this war, (the third article being then in full force, and the eighth article being no longer operative,) we should have attempted to exchange, like General Drummond, the dead for the living. It is not surprising, therefore, that the British Government, in suspecting such an intention, should have rejected our proposition.

I was opposed, however, to making the proposition, not only because I was convinced that it was made with no such intention, but because I believed it would give to Great Britain the free navigation of the Mississippi, under circumstances, and evidently for an object, which would place it on very distinct grounds from those on which it was placed by the treaty of 1783.

The whole of the Mississippi being now exclusively within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States, a simple renewal of the British right to navigate it would place that right beyond the reach of the war, and every other previous circumstance which might have impaired or terminated it; and the right to grant, on our part, being now complete, the right to enjoy, on the part of Great Britain, must be complete also. It would be absurd to suppose that any thing impossible was intended, and that Great Britain was to be allowed to navigate the Mississippi only as she would have navigated it immediately after the treaty of 1783, as if her territories extended to it, and as if Spain was in the entire possession of one of its banks, and of a considerable portion of the other.

The recognition of the British right to navigate the Mississippi would be, under existing circumstances, a new and complete grant to her, measured by these circumstances, and thence embracing not only the entire freedom of the whole extent of the river and its tributary waters, but unrestrained access to it across our territories. If we did not intend to offer this, we intended to offer nothing which Great Britain could accept; and whatever else we might have intended to offer, if not at once rejected by her, would at least have been hereafter the subject of new and endless controversy.

When, however, we connected the revival of the navigation of the Mississippi with the revival of the privilege of taking and curing fish within the British jurisdiction, (two things which never before had any relation to each other,) we evidently meant, if we acted with good faith, not only to concede, as well as to obtain something, but also to be understood as conceding an equivalent for what we obtained.

In thus offering the navigation of the Mississippi, and the access to it through our territories, as an equivalent for the fishing liberty, we not only placed both on ground entirely different from that on which they respectively stood in the treaty of 1783, and acted somewhat inconsistently with our own reasoning, relative to the origin and immortality of the latter, but we offered to concede much more than we could hope to gain by the arrangement.

From the year 1783 to the commencement of the present war, the actual advantage derived from the fishing privilege by the people of the United States were, according to the best information that we could obtain on the subject, very inconsiderable, and annually experiencing a voluntary diminution.

It was discovered that the obscurity and humidity of the atmosphere, owing to almost incessant fogs in the high northern latitudes, where this privilege was chiefly located, prevented the effectual curing of fish in those regions, and, consequently, lessened very much the value of the privilege of taking them there. By far the greatest part of the fish taken by our fishermen before the present war was taken in the open sea, or on our own coasts, and cured on our shores. This branch of the fisheries has been found to be inexhaustible, and has been pursued with so much more certainty and despatch than the privileged portion within British jurisdiction, that it has not only been generally preferred by our fishermen, but would, probably, on longer experience, have been almost universally used by them. It was to be believed, therefore, that a discontinuance of the privilege of taking and curing fish within the British jurisdiction would not at all diminish the aggregate quantity taken by the people of the United States, or vary materially the details of the business.

That part of the fisheries which would still belong to us as a nation (being exhaustless) would afford an ample field for all the capital and industry hitherto employed in the general business of fishing or merchandise of fish; and on that field might the few fishermen, who had hitherto used the liberty of taking and curing fish within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, exert their skill and labor without any serious inconvenience.

That liberty, liable, to a very considerable degree, by the terms in which it was granted, to be curtailed by the Government and subjects of a foreign State; already growing into voluntary disuse by our own citizens, on account of the difficulties inseparable from it, and absolutely incapable of extension; was totally unnecessary to us for subsistence or occupation, and afforded in no honest way, either commercial facility or political advantage. This privilege, too, while it was thus of little and precarious utility to us, cost Great Britain literally nothing.

The free navigation of the Mississippi with the necessary access to it, is a grant of a very different character. If it was not heretofore used by Great Britain, it was, perhaps, because she did not consider herself entitled to it, or because the circumstances of the moment suspended its practical utility. The treaty of 1783 stipulated for her the navigation of this river, under the presumption that her territories extended to it, and of course could not intend to give her access to it through our territories. The British possessions to the westward of Lake Erie being almost entirely unsettled, rendered, perhaps, the free navigation of the Mississippi for the moment of little advantage to her, particularly as her right to reach it was at least equivocal, and as, by another treaty, she could carry on trade with our Indians. This navigation might, indeed, for a long time to come, be of little use to her for all the legitimate purposes of transit and intercourse; but every change that could take place in this respect must increase its importance to her, while every change in the fishing liberty must be to the disadvantage of the United States.

The freedom of navigating the Mississippi, however, is not to be estimated by the mere legitimate uses that would be made of it. The unrestrained and undefined access, which would have been inferred from the article which we proposed, must have placed in the hands of Great Britain and her subjects all the facilities of communication with our own citizens, and with the Indians inhabiting the immense regions of our Western territory. It is not in the nature of things that these facilities should not have been abused for unrighteous purposes. A vast field for contraband and for intrigue would have been laid open, and our Western territories would have swarmed with British smugglers and British emissaries. The revenue would have been defrauded by the illicit introduction of English merchandise; and the lives of our citizens, and the security of a valuable portion of our country would have been exposed to Indian hostility, excited by an uncontrolled British influence.

If our instructions of the 15th of April, 1813, already cited, forbade us, in order to guard against such an influence, to renew the treaty of 1794, "allowing the Northwest Company and British traders to carry on trade with the Indian tribes within our limits—a privilege the pernicious effects of which have been most sensibly felt in the present war"—we certainly violated the spirit of those instructions in offering the means of exercising that influence with still greater facility and effect than could result from that privilege.

What was there in a fishing liberty, either of gain to us or loss to Great Britain, to warrant, in consideration of it, a grant to her of such means of fraud and annoyance? What justice or equality was there, in exposing to all the horrors of savage warfare the unoffending citizens of an immense tract of territory, not at all, or but faintly, benefited by the fishing privilege, merely to provide for the doubtful accommodation of a few fishermen, annually decreasing in number, in a remote quarter, and entirely exempt from the danger? Such have been the reasons which induced me to differ from a majority of my colleagues with regard to the article in question, and which, I trust, will be deemed sufficient, at least, to vindicate my motives.

The unfeigned respect which I feel for the integrity, talents, and judgment of those gentlemen, would restrain me from opposing them on slight grounds; and a deference for their opinions makes me almost fear that I have erred in dissenting from them on the present occasion. I can but rejoice, however, that the article, as proposed by us, was rejected by Great Britain, whatever were her reasons for rejecting it; whether, as above suggested, she might have suspected some tacit reservation, or want of faith, on our part; or supposed, from the price we at once bade for the fishing privilege, that we overrated its value, and might concede for it even more than the free navigation of the Mississippi, with all its accessory advantages.

Let me not, in any thing which I have said, be misunderstood. In judging on the interests of the great whole, I am not disposed to undervalue the interests of any of the constituent parts. No one can more highly appreciate than I do a branch of industry which not only adds to national wealth, but seems to create it. Nor can any one more warmly admire the usefulness and patriotism of those citizens who are engaged in it, and who have never ceased to deserve well of the Republic. In times of peace they bring home, amidst conflicting elements, the treasures of the deep to enrich their country; and in times of war they contribute, by their skill and intrepidity to her defence and glory. But, in our country, where all are equal, the essential security and prosperity of the many must be preferred to the convenience and minor interests of the few. In giving this preference, I will frankly confess I had to silence early prepossessions and local predilections, and to listen to the counsels of a more enlarged patriotism; and to this patriotism I dare appeal for my vindication, not only to those to whom I am officially responsible, but to those with whom I am more immediately connected in society, and whose interests may be considered to have been unfavorably affected by the views which I have deemed it to be my duty to adopt. I have always been willing to make any sacrifice for the fishing privilege which its nature or comparative importance could justify; but I conscientiously believe that the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the access to it which we expressly offered, were pregnant with too much mischief to be offered, indirectly, under our construction of the treaty, or directly, as they were in fact offered, as a new equivalent for the liberty of taking and drying fish within the British jurisdiction.

I will frankly avow, however, that my impressions were, and still are, that Great Britain, calculating on the success of the powerful expedition which she has sent against New Orleans, confidently expected that she would have become the mistress of Louisiana and all its waters; and that she did not, in this event, intend to abandon her conquest under the terms of the Treaty of Ghent.

Her Ministers had, almost from the commencement of the negotiation, not only affected to consider our acquisition of Louisiana as evidence of a spirit of aggrandizement, but insinuated a defect in our title to it. Expecting, therefore, to obtain the free navigation of the Mississippi for nothing, she would not consent to part even with the fishing liberty as an equivalent. If she be disappointed in her views on Louisiana, (and I trust in God and the valor of the West that she will be,) I shall not be surprised if, hereafter, she grants us the fishing privilege, which costs her absolutely nothing, without any extravagant equivalent whatever.

At any rate, we are still at liberty to negotiate for that privilege in a treaty of commerce, and to offer for it an equivalent, fair in its comparative value, and just in its relative effects; and to negotiate for it in this way is evidently more wise than to demand it as a condition of peace, or to offer for it a price beyond its worth, and which, however excessive, runs the hazard of being refused, merely by the operation of those unaccommodating passions which are inevitably engendered by a state of war.

I have the honor to be, with the most profound respect, sir, your faithful and obedient servant,

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Hon. JAMES MONROE,
Secretary of State of the United States.

A true copy of a paper left by Jonathan Russell, Esq., at the Department of State, 22d April, 1822, to be communicated to the House of Representatives of the United States.

J. Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Remarks on a paper delivered by Mr. Jonathan Russell, at the Department of State, on the 22d of April, 1822, to be communicated to the House of Representatives, as the duplicate of a letter written by him at Paris, the 11th February, 1815, to the then Secretary of State, and as the letter called for by the resolution of the House of the 19th April, 1822.

The first remark that presents itself upon this duplicate, is, that it is not a copy of the letter really written by Mr. Russell, at Paris, on the 11th of February, 1815, to the Secretary of State, and received by him. The letter was marked "private," and, as such, was not upon the files of the Department of State; and, although of the same general purport and tenor with the so called duplicate, differed from it in several highly significant passages, of which the following parallel, extracted from the two papers, presents one example:

ORIGINAL.

"How far we conformed to this instruction, with regard to the general right to Louisiana, it is not necessary for me here to inquire; but certainly the majority believed themselves permitted to offer a very explicit proposition, with regard to the navigation of its principal river. I believed, with them, that we were so permitted, and that we were, likewise, permitted to offer a proposition relative to the fishing liberty, and, had the occasion required it, to make proposals concerning the trade to the British East Indies. I was persuaded that treating relative to these privileges, or discussing the obligation or expediency of granting or withholding them, respectively, violated, in no way, our instructions, or affected the general rights which we were forbidden to bring into discussion."

DUPLICATE.

"How far we conformed to this instruction, with regard to the general right to Louisiana, it is not necessary for me here to inquire; but certainly the majority believed themselves to be permitted (their own construction to the contrary notwithstanding) to offer a very explicit proposition, with regard to the navigation of its principal river. Now, this offer, I considered, for the reasons just suggested, not to be a violation of the instructions in question; but I considered it to be against both the letter and the spirit of our other instructions, of the 15th of April, 1813. By these instructions, we were explicitly and implicitly directed 'to avoid any stipulation which might restrain the United States from excluding the British traders from the navigation of the lakes and rivers exclusively within our own jurisdiction.' This instruction applied with the greater force to the Mississippi, because, as it is believed, it was the only river to which it could apply."

"While I believed, therefore, that we were permitted to offer a proposition relative to the fishing liberty, and that, in treating concerning this liberty, or in discussing our claim to it, we in no way violated our instructions, nor affected the general rights which we were forbidden to bring into discussion, I did believe, and do still believe, that we were expressly and unequivocally forbidden to offer, or to renew, a stipulation for the free navigation by the British of the Mississippi—a river within our exclusive jurisdiction."

It is here seen that, while in the original letter Mr. Russell did, with the majority of his colleagues, believe that we were permitted by our instructions to make the proposition with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi, as well as a proposition relative to the fishing liberty, he had, when writing the duplicate, brought himself to the belief, not only that we were not so permitted, but that he had, even at Ghent, considered it as a direct violation both of the letter and spirit of our explicit and implicit instructions of 15th April, 1813. The solution of this difference in the mind of Mr. Russell, between the writing of the original and the duplicate of his letter, may be found in this circumstance: The proposition relating to the navigation of the Mississippi and the fisheries was made to the British Plenipotentiaries on the 1st of December, 1814. It had been discussed at the meetings of the American mission on the preceding 28th and 29th of November. On the 24th of that month the American Plenipotentiaries had received a letter of instructions from the Secretary of State, dated 19th October, 1814, and containing the following passages:

"It has been judged proper to communicate to Congress so much of the instructions given to you by this department as would show the terms on which you were authorized to make peace. These, as well as your communications, have been printed, and several copies are now forwarded to you, as it is believed they may be usefully disposed of in Europe. Should any circumstances have unexpectedly prolonged the negotiation, and you find the British Commissioners disposed to agree to the status ante bellum, you will understand that you are authorized to make it the basis of a treaty."

Now, the status ante bellum, upon which we were thus expressly and unequivocally permitted to conclude a treaty, included not only the recognition of the entire treaty of peace of 1783, but the revival of the first ten articles of the treaty of 1794; not only the freedom to the British to navigate the Mississippi, but free ingress into our territories, and free trade with our Indians. And so entirely was that part of the instructions of 15th of April, 1813, now cited by Mr. Russell, considered by the President as cancelled, that it was omitted from that copy which had been communicated to Congress of "so much of the instructions as would show the terms on which we were authorized to make peace," and of which several printed copies were thus forwarded to us. [See Wait's State Papers, vol. 9, pp. 339 and 358.]

It was scarcely possible that, within the compass of one week, Mr. Russell should have forgotten the receipt of the instruction of 19th October, 1814, fresh from Washington; nor at all possible that he should have considered us as then bound by the instruction of 15th April, 1813, to which, in his duplicate, he now so emphatically refers. The 11th of February, 1815, was yet so recent to the date of the conclusion of the treaty, that, in writing the original of his letter, the recollection of the new instructions of October, 1814, had doubtless not escaped him. But when the duplicate was written, other views had arisen; and their aspects are discovered in the aggravation of charges against the memory of a dead, and the character of living colleagues.

But whether the real sentiments of Mr. Russell at Paris, on the 11th of February, 1815, with regard to the transactions to which this passage relates, are to be taken as indicated in the original, or in the duplicate, certain it is that the vehement objections to the proposed article, which, in the duplicate, appear to have made so deep an impression on his mind, had as little been made known to his colleagues at the time of the discussions at Ghent, as they appear to have been to himself when writing the original of the same letter.

The proposal, to which the whole of Mr. Russell's letter, in both its various readings relates, was made to the British Plenipotentiaries, not by a majority, but by the whole of the American mission, including Mr. Russell, as may be seen by the protocol of the conference of the 1st December, 1814, and by the letter from the American to the British Plenipotentiaries of 14th December, 1814. In that letter, already communicated to the House, the American Plenipotentiaries, referring to the article in question, expressly say: "To such an article, which they viewed as merely declaratory, the undersigned had no objection, and have offered to accede;" and to that letter the name of Mr. Russell is subscribed.

At the time when the letter from Paris was written, or within a few days thereafter, all the colleagues, whose conduct it so severely censures in relation to measures to which Mr. Russell's sanction and signature stood equally pledged with their own, were at Paris, and in habits of almost daily intercourse with him. They little suspected the coloring which he was privately giving, without communication of it to them, of their conduct and opinions, to the head of the Government, by whom he and they had been jointly employed in a public trust of transcendent importance; or the uses to which this denunciation of them was afterwards to be turned.

Had the existence of this letter from Paris been, at the time when it was written, known to the majority of the mission, at whose proposal this offer had been made to that majority; who believed that the article was perfectly compatible with their instructions, consistent with the argument maintained by the mission, important for securing a very essential portion of the right to the fisheries, and in nowise affecting unfavorably the interest of any section of the Union, they would doubtless have felt that its contents called much more forcibly upon them to justify to their own

Jonathan Russell—Treaty of Ghent.

Government themselves and their motives for making that proposal, than Mr. Russell could be called upon to justify himself for merely having been in the minority upon the question whether an article should be proposed, which he did actually concur in proposing, and which the adverse party had not thought worth accepting.

The writer of these remarks is not authorized to speak for his colleagues of the majority; one of whom is now alike beyond the reach of censure and panegyric; and the other, well able, when he shall meet this disclosure, to defend himself. But he believes of them, what he affirms of himself, that, had they entertained of the projected article, and of the argument maintained by the mission, the sentiments avowed in either of the variations of Mr. Russell's letter from Paris, no consideration would have induced them to concur in proposing it, or to subscribe their names to a paper declaring that they had no objection to it.

Still less, if possible, would they have thought it reconcileable with their duty to their country, had they entertained those sentiments, to have subscribed, on the 25th of December, 1814, the joint letter of the mission to the Secretary of State, already communicated to Congress, and on the same day to have written the separate and secret letter, fore-announcing that of 11th of February, 1815, from Paris.

Besides the memorable variation between the original and duplicate of the letter of 11th February, 1815, which has been exhibited in parallel passages extracted from them, there are others not less remarkable. In the course of the duplicate, the total and unqualified abandonment of the rights of the poor fishermen is compensated by an eloquent panegyric upon their usefulness to the country, their hardy industry, their magnanimous enterprise, and their patriotic self-devotion. Little of this appears in the original; and that little, in the after-thought of a postscript. Towards the close of the duplicate, the spirit of prophecy takes possession of the writer. By his "trust in God and in the valor of the West," he foresees the victory of General Jackson at New Orleans; he foresees the convention between the United States and Great Britain of October, 1818. In the original there is no prophecy; no "trust in God, and in the valor of the West."

With all these varieties, the two copies of the letter form an elaborate and deeply meditated dissertation to prove:

1. That the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of 1783—the treaty which upon its face is a treaty of independence, a treaty of boundaries, a treaty of partition, as well as a treaty of peace—was, in his estimation, (all his signatures at Ghent to the contrary notwithstanding,) a mere treaty of peace totally abrogated by the war of 1812.

2. That the same treaty was a treaty sui generis, consisting of two parts: one, of rights appertaining to sovereignty and independence; and the other, of special grants and privileges: of which the former were permanent, and the latter abrogated by the war.

3. That the principles assumed and the argument maintained by the majority of the Ghent mission, and to which he had subscribed his name in all the joint communications of the mission, as well to the British Plenipotentiaries as to his own Government, were a mass of errors, inconsistencies, and absurdities.

4. That the offer to the British Plenipotentiaries of a right to the British to navigate the Mississippi, was, in the opinion of the majority, and also in his own opinion, permitted by our instructions, and in no ways violated them.

5. That the same offer was directly contrary to the construction given by the majority to their instructions, and as he had always thought, and still thought, contrary to explicit and implicit, express and unqualified, prohibitions in those instructions.

6. That the offer of the right to navigate the Mississippi, as an equivalent for the fisheries, was the offer of an excessive price for a privilege worth little or nothing.

7. That, extravagant as that offer (to which he signed a letter declaring that he had no objection) was, it was rejected by the adverse party; because they thought it an offer of the dead for the living; or because they hoped to get still more for the worthless privilege; or because they expected to take and keep Louisiana, and thus get the navigation of the Mississippi for nothing; or because they were blinded by the unhappy passions incident to war: but that he foresaw that they would hereafter grant all the valuable part of the same worthless privilege for nothing.

8. That there was no sort of relation whatsoever between a privilege for the British to navigate in waters within our jurisdiction, and a privilege for us to fish in waters within British jurisdiction; because one of these privileges had been stipulated in the third, and the other in the eighth article of the treaty of 1783; and therefore, that it was absurd to offer one as an equivalent for the other.

9. Lastly. That the offer to the British of the right to navigate the Mississippi was pregnant with mischief to the Western country—to "the unoffending citizens of an immense tract of territory, not at all, or but faintly, benefited by the fishing privilege, merely to provide for the doubtful accommodation of a few fishermen, annually decreasing in number, in a remote quarter, and entirely exempt from the danger."

Upon most of these points, so far as argument is concerned, it might, upon the mere statement of Mr. Russell's positions, be left to his ingenuity to refute itself. His first and second points, with regard to the character of the treaty of 1783, considered as doctrines, are evidently inconsistent with each other. The variation between the original and duplicate of his letter upon the fourth and fifth points is something more than inconsistency, something more even than self-contradiction. The whole letter is a laborious tissue of misrepresentation of every part of its subject; of the conduct and sentiments of his colleagues who constituted the majority of the mission; and of his own conduct and sentiments in opposition to them. It substantially charges them with deliberate and wanton violation, in the face of his solemn warning, of the positive and unequivocal instructions of their Government, for the sake of sacrificing the interest, the peace, the comfortable existence of the whole Western country, to the doubtful accommodation of a few Eastern fishermen, and in support of a claim to which they had not the shadow of a right.

I say it is a tissue of misrepresentations of the subject, of the conduct and sentiments of his colleagues, and of his own conduct in opposition to them.

1. Of the subject. Mr. Russell represents the offer of an article, granting to the British the right of navigating the Mississippi as an equivalent for the grant of a fishing privilege in British jurisdiction, as if it had been a separate and insulated proposal of new grants in a distinct article, without reference to the state of the negotiation at the time when it was made, to the occasion upon which it was made, and to the considerations by which it was induced.

Mr. Russell represents the article as if offered under circumstances when it was by both parties acknowledged that the British had no claim to territory to the Mississippi. This is a direct and positive perversion of the whole statement of the subject.

Mr. Russell represents the offer of a right to navigate the Mississippi, and of access to it from the British territories, as general and unqualified; as giving access to British traders and British emissaries to every part of the Western country, and to intercourse with all our Indians. The proposal was, of a limited access from a single spot of the British territory to the river, for the purpose of navigating the river with merchandise, upon which the duties of import should have been first paid.

In consequence of these misrepresentations, Mr. Russell brings in British smugglers, British emissaries, and all the horrors of Indian warfare, upon the Western country, as necessary inferences from a proposal—not that which was made, but that into which it is distorted by his misrepresentations.

2. Of the conduct and sentiments of his colleagues.

Mr. Russell represents his colleagues as having deliberately, and against his declared opinion, violated both the letter and the spirit of their most explicit and implicit, express and unequivocal, instructions from their own Government. He charges them, also, with having violated their own construction of their instructions.

It is true that, in another reading of the same letter, purporting to have been written on the same day, he acquits them entirely of all violation of their instructions, and declares he had always been of that opinion.

Mr. Russell ascribes to his colleagues opinions which they never entertained, arguments which they never advanced, and doctrines which they not only would disclaim with indignation, but diametrically opposite to those which they did maintain. He imputes to them the opinion that the independence of the United States was derived only from the Treaty of Peace of 1783, and that all the rights stipulated by it, in favor of the people of the United States, were mere grants from the Crown of England. This was the British doctrine, which Mr. Russell well knew his colleagues rejected with disdain, but which he himself countenances, by maintaining the British side of the argument—that the fishing liberty, stipulated in the Treaty of 1783, was abrogated, ipso facto, by the war of 1812.

He imputes to them, as an inconsistency with their other imputed opinion, that they rested their claim to the fishing privilege upon prescription; and this notwithstanding all the light of learning with which he had irradiated them, from the lucid sources of "jus mere facultatis;" of "ultra memoriam hominis;" of "nullum tempus regi occurrit;" and of the imprescriptible character of fisheries. Of all this not one word was said at Ghent. The majority never asserted the right of the fishing privilege as resting upon the right of prescription; nor had they ever the benefit of Mr. Russell's learned labors to prove that it was not applicable to the subject.

3. Of his own conduct and sentiments in opposition to those of the majority of his colleagues.

The parallel passages from the original and duplicate of his letter remove all necessity for further proof of this. But that is not all. Throughout the letter, Mr. Russell holds himself forth as having been the intrepid and inflexible assertor and supporter of the rights of the West against the majority of his colleagues; as having, by a painful struggle, obtained a conquest over his early prejudices and local partialities; and enlarged his intellectual faculties and patriotism, to become the champion and vindicator of the interest of the West. Of all this, nothing was made known to his colleagues of the majority at Ghent. The article to which his letter conjures up such formidable objections was drawn up and proposed to the mission by a distinguished citizen of the Western country. It was opposed by another citizen from the same section of the Union. Of the five members of the mission Mr. Russell was the person who took the least part in the discussion. He neither objected that it was contrary to our instructions; nor depreciated the value of the fisheries; nor painted the dangers of British smugglers and emissaries, or the horrors of Indian warfare, as impending over the unoffending inhabitants of the Western country from the measure. He gave, it may be, a silent vote against proposing the article; and, when it was determined by the majority to propose it, concurred in proposing it; was present at the conferences with the British Plenipotentiaries when it was proposed to and discussed with them, and heard from them the reasons which induced them to reject it; which reasons did not embrace one of those which he has so severely tasked his sagacity to devise for them, but, plainly and simply, because they said it was clogged with conditions which made it of no value to them, or, at least, not of value to induce them to concede that our fishing liberties within British jurisdiction should continue, in return: and he afterwards signed a letter to the

Jonathan Russell—Treaty of Ghent.

British Plenipotentiaries, together with all the other members of the mission, declaring that they had no objection to the article, considering it as merely declaratory.

If Mr. Russell had entertained at Ghent the sentiments relating to the measure disclosed in the duplicate, or even those avowed in the original of his letter, he is to account for it to his conscience and his country that he ever assented to it at all. He was not under the slightest obligation to assent to it. As an act of the majority, it would have been equally valid without his concurrence or signature as with it. More than one member of the mission, and on more than one occasion, signified his determination to decline signing the treaty, if particular measures, proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries, should be acceded to by the majority. A refusal by any one member to concur in any measure upon which a majority were agreed, would at least have induced the majority to reconsider their vote, and in all probability to have cancelled it. In a case of such transcendent importance as this, of high interests, generous policy, humane and tender sympathies, wantonly to be sacrificed, in defiance of the most express and unqualified instructions, to the paltry purpose of accommodating a few fishermen, destitute of all claim of right, how could Mr. Russell sit patiently in conference with the British Plenipotentiaries, and join in the offer of it to them? How could he subscribe his name to a letter declaring he had no objection to it? Had Mr. Russell dissented from this measure of the majority, and they had still persisted in it, he would doubtless have reported to his own Government the reasons of his dissent; his colleagues of the majority would in like manner have reported theirs; and the responsibility of each party would have rested, as it ought, upon their respective acts. To concur individually in the measure, to sign all the papers approving it, and then secretly to write to the Government a letter of censure, reproach, and misrepresentation, against it and those who proposed it, was indeed a shorter and easier process.

Mr. Russell, therefore, did not entertain or express at Ghent the opinions disclosed in his letter from Paris, and has been as unfortunate in the representation of his own conduct and sentiments as in that of the subject of his letter, and in that of the sentiments and conduct of his colleagues.

But there is a point of view more important than any regard to his conduct and sentiments in which his letter is yet to be considered. If there were any force in his argument against the measures, or any correctness in his statements against his colleagues, it is proper they should be sifted and examined.

Let us, therefore, examine the proposed article in both its parts: First, as relates to the fishing liberty for us; and, secondly, to the navigation of the Mississippi by the British. And in order to ascertain the propriety of the principles assumed, and of the measures adopted by the American Commissioners, as now in question, let us premise the state of things as they existed, and the circumstances under which this proposal was offered.

By the third article of the treaty of 1783, it was agreed that the people of the United States should continue to enjoy the fisheries of Newfoundland and the Bay of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time theretofore to fish; and, also, that they should have certain fishing liberties on all the fishing coast within the British jurisdiction of Nova Scotia, Magdalen islands, and Labrador. The title by which the United States held those fishing rights and liberties was the same. It was the possessory use of the right, or, in Mr. Russell's more learned phrase, of the "jus mere facultatis," at any time theretofore as British subjects, and the acknowledgment by Great Britain of its continuance in the people of the United States after the treaty of separation. It was a national right; and, therefore, as much a right, though not so immediate an interest, to the people of Ohio and Kentucky—ay, and to the people of Louisiana, after they became a part of the people of the United States—as it was to the people of Massachusetts and Maine; the latter had always used it since they had been British colonists, and the coasts had been in British dominions. But, as the settlement of the colonies themselves had not been of time immemorial, it was not, and never was pretended to be, a title by prescription.

Such was the title of the United States to the fisheries—prior possession, and acknowledgment by the treaty of 1783.

The Commissioners at Ghent had received from the Secretary of State a letter of instruction dated 25th of June, 1814, containing the following passage:

"Information has been received from a quarter deserving of attention, that the late events in France have produced such an effect on the British Government as to make it probable that a demand will be made at Gottenberg to surrender our right to the fisheries, to abandon all trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and to cede Louisiana to Spain. We cannot believe that such a demand will be made; should it be, you will, of course, treat it as it deserves. These rights must not be brought into discussion. If insisted on, your negotiations will cease."

Now, it is very true that a majority of the Commissioners did construe these instructions to mean that the right to the fisheries was not to be surrendered. They did not subtilize, and refine, and inquire whether they could not surrender a part, and yet not bring the right into discussion; whether we might not give up a liberty, and yet retain a right; or whether it was an argument or an agreement that was forbidden. They understood that the fisheries were not to be surrendered.

The demand made by the British Government was first advanced in an artful and ensnaring form. It was by assuming the principle that the right had been forfeited by the war, and by notifying the American Commissioners, as they did at the first conference, "that the British Government did not intend to grant to the United States, gratuitously, the privileges formerly granted by treaty to them—of fishing within the limits of the British sovereignty, and of using the shores of the British territories for purposes connected with the fisheries." Now, to obtain the surrender of thus much of the fisheries, all that the British Plenipotentiaries could possibly desire was, that the American Commissioners should acquiesce in the principle that the treaty of 1783 was abrogated by the war. Assent to this principle would have been surrender of the right. Mr. Russell, if we can make any thing of his argument, would have assented and surrendered, and comforted himself with the reflection that, as the right had not been brought into discussion, the instructions would not have been violated.

But, however clearly he expresses this opinion in his letter, and however painfully he endeavors to fortify it by argument, he never did disclose it to the same extent at Ghent. The only way in which it was possible to meet the notification of the British Plenipotentiaries, without surrendering the rights which it jeopardized, was by denying the principle upon which it was founded. This was done by asserting the principle, that the treaty of independence of 1783 was of that class of treaties, and the right in question of the character which are not abrogated by a subsequent war; that the notification of the intention of the British Government not to renew the grant could not affect the right of the United States, which had not been forfeited by the war; and that, considering it as still in force, the United States needed no new grant from Great Britain to revive, nor any new article to confirm it.

This principle, I willingly admit, was assumed and advanced by the American Commissioners at my suggestion. I believed it not only indispensably necessary to meet the insidious form in which the British demand of surrender had been put forth, but sound in itself, and maintainable on the most enlarged, humane, and generous principles of international law. It was asserted and maintained by the American Plenipotentiaries at Ghent; and if, in the judgment of Mr. Russell, it suffered the fishing liberty to be brought into discussion, at least it did not surrender the right.

It was not acceded to by the British Plenipotentiaries. Each party adhered to its asserted principle; and the treaty was concluded without settling the interest involved in it. Since that time, and after the original of Mr. Russell's letter of the 11th February, 1815, was written, the principle asserted by the American Plenipotentiaries at Ghent has been still asserted and maintained through two long and arduous negotiations with Great Britain, and has passed the ordeal of minds of no inferior ability. It has terminated in a new and satisfactory arrangement of the great interest connected with it, and in a substantial admission of the principle asserted by the American Plenipotentiaries at Ghent, by that convention of the 20th October, 1818, which, according to the duplicate of Mr. Russell's letter, he foresaw, in February, 1815, even while writing his learned dissertation against the right which he had been instructed not to surrender, and the only principle by which it could be defended.

At this time, and after all the controversy through which the American principle was destined to pass, and has passed, I, without hesitation, reassert, in the face of my country, the principle which, in defence of the fishing liberties of this nation, was, at my suggestion, asserted by the American Plenipotentiaries at Ghent.

I deem this reassertion of it the more important, because, by the publication, at this time, of Mr. Russell's letter, that Plenipotentiary has not only disclaimed all his share in the first assertion of it, but has brought to bear all the faculties of his mind against it; while the American side of the argument, and the reasons by which it has been supported against arguments coinciding much with those of his letter, but advanced by British reasoners, are not before the public. The principle is yet important to great interests, and to the future welfare of this country.

When first suggested, it obtained the unanimous assent of the American mission. In their note of the 10th November, 1814, to the British Plenipotentiaries, which accompanied their first projet of a treaty, they said, "in answer to the declaration made by the British Plenipotentiaries respecting the fisheries, the undersigned, referring to what passed in the conference of the 9th August, can only state, that they are not authorized to bring into discussion any of the rights or liberties which the United States have heretofore enjoyed in relation thereto. From their nature, and from the peculiar character of the treaty of 1783, by which they were recognised, no further stipulation has been deemed necessary, by the Government of the United States, to entitle them to the full enjoyment of all of them." This paragraph was drawn up and proposed to the mission by the member with whom Mr. Russell concurred in objecting to the proposal of an article confirmative of the fishing liberties and navigation of the Mississippi, and as a substitute for it. The mission unanimously accepted it; and the fishing liberties being thus secured from surrender, no article relating to them or to the Mississippi was inserted in the projet sent to the British mission.

But one of the objects of the negotiation was to settle the boundary between the United States and the British dominions, from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, westward. That boundary, by the treaty of 1783, had been stipulated to be "from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, on a due west course to the river Mississippi; and thence, down the middle of the Mississippi, to the thirty-first degree of north latitude;" while, by the eighth article of the same treaty, it had been stipulated that "the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, should forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States."

The right of Great Britain and of the United States, at the time of the treaty of 1783, to make this stipulation with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi, might be, and afterwards was, questioned by Spain, then a possessor also of territories upon the same river, and indeed of both its banks from its mouth to a higher latitude than that thus stipulated as the boundary of the United States. But, as between Great Britain and the United States, there could, at the time of the conclusion of the treaty of 1783, be no possible question of the right of both to make the stipulation; the boundary line itself being in substance a concession of territory to the river, and down its middle to latitude thirty-one, which Great Britain was undoubtedly competent to make, and the United States to receive. Now, the United States having received the cession and the boundary, with the right to navigate the river, with the express condition that the navigation of the river should forever remain free and open to British subjects; and having expressly assented to that condition, without considering it as infringing upon any right of Spain; they could not, consistently with good faith, by acquiring afterwards the right of Spain, allege that this acquisition absolved them from the obligation of the prior engagement with Great Britain. There is, indeed, in Mr. Russell's letter, a hesitating argument to that effect; the odious character of which is but flimsily veiled by its subtlety. The United States had always insisted upon their right of navigating the Mississippi by force of the article of the treaty of 1783, and had obtained the acknowledgment of that right from Spain herself, many years before they acquired her territorial right by the purchase of Louisiana. With what front, then, could an American negotiator have said, after the latter period, to a British Minister: You have no right to the navigation of the Mississippi; for although, on receiving from you a part of the river, we expressly stipulated that you should forever enjoy a right to its navigation, yet that engagement was a fraud upon the rights of Spain; and, although, long before we had acquired these rights of Spain, she had acknowledged our right to navigate the river, founded upon this very stipulation of which you now claim the benefit, yet I will now not acknowledge your right, founded on the same stipulation. Spain, no party to the compact between you and me, after controverting it as infringing upon her rights, finally acceded to its beneficial application to us, as compatible with those rights. But we, who made the compact with you, having now acquired the adverse rights of Spain, will not allow you the beneficial use of our own compact. We first swindled and then bullied Spain out of her rights, by this eighth article of the treaty of 1783; and now, having acquired ourselves those rights, we plead them for holding our engagement with you for a dead letter.

This, and nothing more or less than this, is the substance of Mr. Russell's argument to show that perhaps the United States were, by the acquisition of Louisiana, absolved from the obligation of the eighth article of the treaty of 1783, even before the war of 1812.

But, says Mr. Russell, the treaty of 1783 was made under a belief of both parties that it would leave Great Britain with a portion of territory upon the Mississippi, and therefore entitled to claim the right of navigating the river. But the boundary line of the treaty of 1783 was a line from the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods, due west to the Mississippi. And after the treaty of 1783, but before the war of 1812, it had been found that a line due west from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods did not strike the Mississippi; therefore, continues Mr. Russell, Great Britain could claim no territorial right to the navigation of the river; and therefore had no longer any claim to the benefit of the eighth article of the treaty of 1783.

To this it may be replied: first, that the British claim of right to navigate the Mississippi was not founded solely on the territory which it was believed they would retain upon that river, by the boundary west from the Lake of the Woods. The eighth article of the treaty of 1783 was a separate and distinct article, stipulating the right of both nations to navigate the river, without any reference to boundary or to territory. But the boundary, the territory, and the right to navigate the river, were all, in that treaty, cessions from Great Britain to the United States. And had it even been the intention of both parties that Britain should cede the whole of her territories on the Mississippi, it was yet competent to her to reserve the right of navigating the river for her subjects, in common with the people of the United States; and competent for the United States to accept the cession, subject to that reservation. They did so, by the eighth article of the treaty. And, in this point of view, the British right of navigating the river within the American territory was precisely similar to the American liberty of fishing within the British territorial jurisdiction, reserved by the third article of the same treaty.

But, secondly, the discovery that a line due west from the northwesternmost corner of the Lake of the Woods would not strike the Mississippi, had not deprived Great Britain of all claim to territory upon that river, at the time of the negotiation at Ghent. The line described in the treaty was, from the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods, "on a due west course to the river Mississippi." When it was found that a line due west did not touch the Mississippi, this boundary was annulled by the fact. It remained an unsettled boundary, to be adjusted by a new agreement. For this adjustment, the moral obligation of the parties was to adopt such a line as should approximate as near as possible to the intentions of both parties, in agreeing upon the line for which it was to be substituted. For ascertaining this line, if the United States were entitled to the benefit of the words "on a due west course," Britain was equally entitled to the benefit of the words "to the river Mississippi." Both the demands stood on the same grounds. Before the war of 1812, three abortive attempts had been made by the parties to adjust this boundary. The first was by the treaty of 1794, when it was already conjectured, but not ascertained, that the line due west from the lake would not intersect the Mississippi. By the fourth article of the treaty of 1794, it was agreed that a joint survey should be made to ascertain the fact; and that if, on the result of that survey, it should appear that the west line would not intersect the river, the parties would proceed, "by amicable negotiation, to regulate the boundary line in that quarter, according to justice and mutual convenience, and in conformity to the intent of the treaty of 1783." This survey was never made. The second attempt to adjust the line was by the convention signed on the 12th of May, 1803, by Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury; the fifth article of which, after reciting the same uncertainty whether a line drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods would intersect the Mississippi, provided that, instead of the said line, the boundary of the United States, in that quarter, should, and was declared to be, the shortest line which could be drawn between the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods and the nearest source of the river Mississippi. This convention not having been ratified, the third attempt at adjustment had been made in the negotiation of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, of 1806 and 1807; at which an article had been proposed, and agreed to, that the line should be from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; and from that point, due west, along and with the said parallel, as far as the respective territories extend in that quarter. And with that article was coupled another, as follows:

"It is agreed by the United States, that His Majesty's subjects shall have, at all times, free access from His Majesty's aforesaid territories, by land or inland navigation, into the aforesaid territories of the United States, to the river Mississippi, with the goods and effects of His Majesty's said subjects, in order to enjoy the benefit of the navigation of that river, as secured to them by the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States, and also by the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation of 1794. And it is further agreed, that His Majesty's subjects shall, in like manner, and at all times, have free access to all the waters and rivers falling into the western side of the river Mississippi, and to the navigation of the said river."

This negotiation was suspended by a change of the British ministry, and was not afterwards resumed. But the following observations upon the two articles, contained in a letter from Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, of the 30th July, 1807, show how far Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, had authorized those commissioners to accede to them:

"Access by land or inland navigation from the British territories, through the territory of the United States, to the river Mississippi, is not to be allowed to British subjects, with their goods or effects, unless such articles shall have paid all the duties, and be within all the custom-house regulations applicable to goods and effects of citizens of the United States. An access through the territory of the United States to the waters running into the western side of the Mississippi is, under no modification whatever, to be stipulated to British subjects."

Such, then, was the state of things, in relation to this interesting question, at the time when the war of 1812 broke out; and, at the negotiation of Ghent, the same question of boundary again occurred for adjustment. The right of the British to a line from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi had never been renounced; and at the last negotiation between the parties, four years after the United States had acquired Louisiana, and with it all the Spanish rights upon the Mississippi, the British Government, in assenting to take the forty-ninth parallel of latitude as a substitute for the line to the Mississippi, had expressly restipulated for the free navigation of the river, and free access to it from our territories; to both of which Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney had been explicitly authorized to accede.

Under this state of things, it had never been admitted by the British, nor could we maintain against them by argument even, that the Mississippi river was within our exclusive jurisdiction; for so long as they had a right by treaty to a line of boundary to that river, and consequently to territory upon it, they also had jurisdiction upon it; nor, consequently, could the instructions of 15th April, 1813, had they even been still in full force, have restricted the American Commissioners from making or receiving a proposition for continuing to the British, the right of navigating the river, which they had enjoyed, without ever using it, from the time of the treaty of 1783, when the United States had received, by cession from them, the right of enjoying it jointly with them.

Bearing in mind this state of things, we are also to remember that, in the conference of 19th August, 1814, and in the letter of that date from the British to the American Plenipotentiaries, (see Wait's State Papers, vol. 9, pp. 334, 338,) they had claimed a new Northwestern boundary line from Lake Superior to the Mississippi, and the free navigation of that river. To this the American Commissioners had answered, on the 24th of August, 1814: The undersigned perceive that the British Government "propose, without purpose specifically alleged, to draw the boundary line westward, not from the Lake of the Woods, as it now is, but from Lake Superior:" and they objected to it, as demanding a cession of territory.

The British Plenipotentiaries, on the 4th of September, 1814, replied:

"As the necessity for fixing some boundary for the Northwestern frontier has been mutually acknowledged, a proposal for a discussion on that subject cannot be considered as a demand for a cession of territory, unless the United States are prepared to assert that there is no limit to their territories in that direction; and that, availing themselves of the geographical error upon which that part of the treaty of 1783 was formed, they will acknowledge no boundary whatever; then, unquestionably, any proposition to fix one, be it what it may, must be considered as demanding a large cession of territory from the United States.

"Is the American Government prepared to assert such an unlimited right, so contrary to the evident intention of the treaty itself? Or, is His Majesty's Government to understand that the American Plenipotentiaries are willing to acknowledge the boundary from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi (the arrangement made by a convention in 1803, but not ratified,) as that by which their Government is ready to abide?

"The British Plenipotentiaries are instructed to accept favorably such a proposition, or to discuss any other line of boundary which may be submitted for consideration."

I stop here for a moment to observe, how instinctively, if the expression may be allowed, both the parties in this correspondence recur to the treaty of 1783, with a consciousness that it was yet in full force, as an appeal for either in support of its claims. The expression in the above American note applied to the boundary "as it now is;" the reference of the British note to the geographical error in the treaty of 1783, and their willingness to discuss the arrangement of 1803, (the shortest line from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi.) Both acknowledge the treaty of 1783 as the basis of all proposition and all argument, and as being yet in force for every thing which should not be otherwise provided for in the new treaty.

In their note of 21st October, 1814, the British Commissioners said:

"On the subject of the fisheries, the undersigned expressed with so much frankness, at the conference already referred to, the views of their Government, that they consider any further observations on that topic as unnecessary at the present time.

"On the question of the boundary between the dominions of His Majesty and those of the United States, the undersigned are led to expect, from the discussion which this subject has already undergone, that the Northwestern boundary, from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, (the intended arrangement of 1803,) will be admitted without objection."

Thus stood the parties and the subject, when, on the 10th of November, 1814, the American Plenipotentiaries sent the first projet of a treaty to the British Commissioners. It contained no article relating either to the fisheries or to the Mississippi; but, in the note which accompanied it, to meet the notification twice given on the part of the British Government, that they did not intend to grant, without equivalent, the liberty of fishing within the British jurisdiction, the counter-notification, already noticed, was introduced, informing them that the American Government did not consider the fishing liberties as forfeited by the war, and that they would remain in full force, without needing any new grant to confirm them. At this stage of the negotiation, therefore, the American Plenipotentiaries did actually pursue the first of those three other ways of proceeding, which Mr. Russell, in the postscript to the original of his letter of 11th February, 1815, says they might have taken, and to which he adds that he would have assented, namely: to contend for the continuance of the fishing privilege, notwithstanding ing the war, without saying any thing about the navigation of the Mississippi. It cannot but be surprising to find Mr. Russell, within three months after these events, writing privately to the Secretary of State, stating this as a course other than that which we had pursued, and that he would have assented to it if we had; when it was the very course that we did pursue, and he had assented to it. We did contend, not for the indestructibility, as Mr. Russell terms it, of the treaty of 1783; but that, from its peculiar character, it was not abrogated by the mere occurrence of war. We never maintained that the treaty of 1783 was indestructible or imperishable; but that the rights, liberties, and boundaries, acknowledged by it as belonging to us, were not abrogated by mere war. We never doubted, for example, that we might be compelled to stipulate a new boundary; but that would have been, not as a consequence of mere war, but the effect of conquest resulting from war. The difference between our principle and that of the British was, that they, considering the rights acknowledged as belonging to us by the treaty as mere grants, held them as annulled by war alone; while we, viewing them as rights existing before the treaty, and only acknowledged by it, could not admit them to be forfeited without our own assent. Britain might have recovered them by conquest; but that could not be consummated without our acquiescence, tacit or expressed. Mr. Russell, who assented to our principle, and asserted it with us, now says he always thought the British principle was the true one. If the American mission, at that trying time, had acted upon it, he never would have prophesied the convention of October, 1818.

The eighth article of the projet of a treaty, sent by the American Commissioners on the 10th of November, offered the boundary which had been proposed in 1807, a line north or south to latitude 49°, and westward, on that parallel, as far as the territories of the two countries extended; and said nothing about the Mississippi. But when, on the 26th of November, the British Plenipotentiaries returned the projet with their proposed amendments, they accepted the 49th parallel westward from the Lake of the Woods for the boundary, but with the following addition to the article: "And, it is further agreed, the subjects of His Britannic Majesty shall at all times have access, from His Britannic Majesty's territories, by land or inland navigation, into the aforesaid territories of the United States to the river Mississippi, with their goods, effects, and merchandise; and that His Britannic Majesty's subjects shall have and enjoy the free navigation of the said river."

It was to meet this demand that, at the conference of the 1st of December, the American Plenipotentiaries proposed to strike out all those words, and to substitute the amendment contained in the protocol of that conference, already communicated to Congress. It was thus that the relation which Mr. Russell, within three months afterwards, so singularly professes not to perceive between the fishing liberties and the Mississippi navigation, not only naturally arose, but forced itself upon the American Plenipotentiaries. They had saved the fishing liberties from surrender, as they had been specially instructed to do, by asserting that the treaty of 1783 had not been abrogated ipso facto by the war. Two days before receiving this counter-project, they had received from Washington a fresh instruction, expressly authorizing them to conclude a treaty on the basis of the status ante bellum, including, of course, the fishing liberty on one side, and the navigation of the Mississippi on the other. They could not, therefore, consistently with those instructions, either reject this British demand, or abandon to surrender the fisheries. They offered, therefore, the amendment containing the renewed acknowledgment of both; and they said to the British Plenipotentiaries: We have told you that we consider all the rights secured to us by the treaty of 1783 as still in force. What we demand, if you assent to it, we must yield in return. If, as we say, the treaty of 1783 is yet in force, you have the right of navigating the Mississippi, and we have the fishing rights and liberties unimpaired. If, as you say, the treaty is abrogated, how can you claim the right of navigating the Mississippi? You must admit the one, or not demand the other. We offer you the alternative of a new stipulated admission of both, or a total omission of both. We offer you in application the choice of our principle or of your own.

The British Commissioners took the proposal for reference to their Government, by whom it was immediately rejected. But, to show how anxious they were to obtain from us the surrender of our fishing liberties, and how cheaply they valued the right of navigating the Mississippi, as one of the last expedients of negotiation, they offered us an article, agreeing that, after the peace, the parties would further negotiate "respecting the terms, conditions, and regulations, under which the inhabitants of the United States" should again enjoy the fishing liberties, "in consideration of a fair equivalent, to be agreed upon between His Majesty and the said United States, and granted by the said United States for such liberty aforesaid;" and a reciprocal stipulation with regard to the British right of navigating the Mississippi. As the parties after the peace would have been just as competent further to negotiate on these points, if so disposed, without this article as with it, its only effect would have been a mutual surrender, on the American side, of the fishing liberties, and, on the British side, of the right to navigate the Mississippi; with this difference, that we should have surrendered, in direct violation of our instructions, a real, existing, practical liberty, which, even in the war of our independence, had been deemed of the highest importance, and at its close had been with infinite difficulty secured: a liberty, of which that portion of the Union whom it immediately concerns, had been, from the time of the treaty of 1783, in the constant, real, and useful possession; while the British would have surrendered absolutely nothing—a right which, by inference from their own principle, was abrogated by the war; a right which, under the treaty of 1783, they had enjoyed for thirty years without ever using it; and which, in all human probability, never would have been of more beneficial use to the British nation, than would be, to the people of the United States, the right of navigating the Bridgewater canal or the Danube.

There was certainly an inconsistency on the part of the British Government, in claiming a right to navigate the Mississippi, while asserting that the treaty of 1783 was abrogated by the war: and when pressed by us to say on what principle they claimed it without offering for it an equivalent, they said the equivalent was their acceptance of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude for the Northwestern boundary, instead of the line to which they were entitled by the treaty of 1783—to the Mississippi. As they gave up the line to the river, they said they had a right to reserve its navigation, and access to it for that purpose. They had said the same thing to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney in 1807; and the principle had been assented to by them, with the subsequent sanction of President Jefferson. Still, the whole argument leaned upon the continuing validity of the treaty of 1783; for the boundary line, as well as the Mississippi navigation, was null and void, if that treaty was abrogated. We replied to them, that, although we were willing to agree to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude for the boundary, and thought it of mutual interest that the line should be fixed, we were yet not tenacious of it: we could not agree to their article of mutual surrender, with a pledge of future negotiation; but we would consent to omit the boundary article itself, and leave the whole subject for future adjustment. And to this they finally agreed.

The advantage of this to us was, that we came out of the war without having surrendered the fishing liberties, as they had been enjoyed before, and stipulated at the treaty of 1783. We were still free to maintain, and we did, after the conclusion of peace, effectively maintain, the existence of the right, notwithstanding the intervening war. The British Government still insisted that the treaty of 1783 was abrogated by the war: but when called upon to show, why then they treated the United States as an independent nation, and why, in the Treaty of Ghent, they had agreed to four several commissions to ascertain boundaries, "according to the true intent and meaning of that same treaty of 1783," they finally answered, that they considered our independence, and the boundaries, as existing facts, like those of other nations, without reference to their origin. This left nothing but a dispute about words; for we applied the same principle to the fishing liberties of the third article, which they conceded with regard to the acknowledgment of independence and to the boundaries. They considered the whole treaty of 1783 as a British grant. We considered it as a British acknowledgment. They never drew the nice distinction, attempted by Mr. Russell, between a perishable and imperishable part of the treaty, or admitted that it consisted of rights which they could not, and of privileges which they could, resume without our consent. By their principle, they might have resumed the whole: and when they notified to us, at Ghent, that they did not intend to grant us again the fishing liberties within their exclusive jurisdiction, but that they meant to leave us the right of fishing in the open sea, they gave us distinctly enough to understand that they were treating us with magnanimity in not resuming the whole. There was, in truth, no difference in the principle; and Mr. Russell, in consulting his Vattel, to find that fishing rights were jura meræ facultatis, and, therefore, imprescriptible, ought to have seen what that writer very explicitly says—not that they were rights which could not be acquired by long usage, but rights which could not be lost by non-user. He ought also to have seen, what Vattel no less clearly lays down, that, although a nation may appropriate to itself a fishery upon its own coasts and within its own jurisdiction, yet, “if it has once acknowledged the common right of other nations to come and fish there, it can no longer exclude them from it; it has left that fishery in its primitive freedom, at least with respect to those who have been in possession of it.” And he cites the herring fishery on the coast of England, as being common to them with other nations, because, they had not appropriated it to themselves from the beginning.

In perusing the letter of Mr. Russell, whether original or duplicate, I cannot but reflect with gratitude to Providence upon the slender thread by which the rights of this nation to the fisheries were in fact suspended at the negotiation of Ghent. Positive and precise as our instructions were, not to surrender them, if Mr. Russell had disclosed at Ghent the opinions avowed in either version of his letter; if he had so broadly asserted and so pertinaciously maintained his conviction of the utter worthlessness of the fisheries, in comparison with the exclusion of the British from a mere phantom of right to navigate the Mississippi, which they had always enjoyed without use, without benefit to themselves or injury to us; if he had so learnedly disserted to prove that the treaty of 1783 was totally and absolutely abrogated by the war; if he had so thoroughly inverted the real state of the question, and painted it in such glowing colors as a sacrifice of the deep, real interests of the West, to a shallow, imaginary interest of the East; if, with that perseverance which is the test of sincerity, he had refused to sign the proposal determined upon by the majority of his colleagues, and given them notice that he should transmit to his Government the vindication of himself and his motives for differing from them; and, above all, if another mind could have been found in the mission capable of concurring with him in those views, it would at least have required of the majority an inflexibility of fortitude, beyond that of any trial by which they were visited, to have persevered in their proposal. Had they concurred with him in his opinion of the total abrogation of the treaty of 1783, by the mere fact of the war, the fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the coast of Labrador, and to an indefinite extent from the Island of Newfoundland, were lost to the United States forever; or at least till the indignant energy of the nation should have recovered, by conquest, the rights thus surrendered to usurpation. In notifying to us that the British Government intended not to renew the grant of the fisheries within British jurisdiction, they had not said what extent they meant to give to these terms. They had said they did not mean to extend it to the right of the fisheries, generally, or in the open seas, enjoyed by all other nations. (See letter of the American Commissioners to the Secretary of State of the 12th August, 1814. Wait's State Papers, vol. 9, p. 321.) But there was not wanting historical exposition of what Great Britain understood by her exclusive jurisdiction as applied to these fisheries. In the twelfth article of the Treaty of Utrecht, by which Nova Scotia or Acadia had been ceded by France to Great Britain, the cession had been made “in such ample manner and form, that the subjects of the Most Christian King shall hereafter be excluded from all kind of fishing in the said seas, bays, and other places on the coast of Nova Scotia; that is to say, on those which lie towards the east, within thirty leagues, beginning from the island commonly called Sable, inclusively, and thence along towards the southwest.”

By the thirteenth article of the same treaty, French subjects were excluded from fishing on any other part of the coast of the Island of Newfoundland than from Cape Bonavista northward, and thence westward to Point Riche. By the fifteenth article of the Treaty of Utrecht, between Great Britain and Spain, certain rights of fishing at the island of Newfoundland had been reserved to the Guipuscoans, and other subjects of Spain; but in the eighteenth article of the treaty of peace between Great Britain and Spain, of 1763, His Catholic Majesty had desisted, “as well for himself as for his successors, from all pretension which he might have formed, in favor of the Guipuscoans and others his subjects, to the right of fishing in the neighborhood of the island of Newfoundland.” In these several cases, it is apparent that Great Britain had asserted and maintained an exclusive and proprietary jurisdiction over the whole fishing grounds of the Grand Bank, as well as on the coast of North America, and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Nor are we without subsequent indications of what she would have considered as her exclusive jurisdiction, if a majority of the American Commission at Ghent had been as ready, as Mr. Russell declares himself to have been, to subscribe to her doctrine, that all our fishing liberties had lost, by the war, every vestige of right; for, in the Summer of 1815, the year after the conclusion of the peace, her armed vessels on the American coast warned all American fishing vessels not to approach within sixty miles of the shores.

It was this incident which led to the negotiations which terminated in the Convention of 20th October, 1818. In that instrument the United States have renounced forever that part of the fishing liberties which they had enjoyed, or claimed, in certain parts of the exclusive jurisdiction of the British provinces, and within three marine miles of the shores. This privilege, without being of much use to our fishermen, had been found very inconvenient to the British; and, in return, we have acquired an enlarged liberty, both of fishing and drying fish, within the other ports of the British jurisdiction, forever. The first article of this Convention affords a signal testimonial of the correctness of the principle assumed by the American Plenipotentiaries at Ghent; for, by accepting the express renunciation by the United States of a small portion of the privilege in question, and by confirming and enlarging all the remainder of the privilege forever, the British Government have implicitly acknowledged that the liberties of the third article of the treaty of 1783 had not been abrogated by the war, and have not given the final stroke to the opposite doctrine of Mr. Russell. That words of perpetuity, in a treaty, cannot give that character to the engagements it contains, is not indeed a new discovery in diplomatic history; but that truism has as little concern with this question as the annulment of our treaty of 1778 with France, so aptly applied to it in his letter. It is not, therefore, the word forever, in this convention, which will secure to our fishermen, for all time, the liberties stipulated and recognised in it; but it was introduced by our negotiators, and admitted by those of Great Britain, as a warning, that we shall never consider the liberties secured to us by it as abrogated by mere war. They may, if they please, in case of a war, consider the convention as abrogated, but the privileges as existing, without reference to their origin. But they and we, I trust, are forever admonished against the stratagem of demanding a surrender, in the form of notifying a forfeiture. They and we are aware, forever, that nothing but our own renunciation can deprive us of the right.

The second article of this same convention affords a demonstration equally decisive, how utterly insignificant and worthless, in the estimation of the British Government, was this direfully dreaded navigation of the Mississippi. The article gives us the forty-ninth parallel of latitude for the boundary, and neither the navigation of the river, nor access to it, was even asked in return.

These are conclusive facts—facts appealing not to the prejudices or the jealousies, but to the sound sense and sober judgment of men. Without yielding at all to Mr. Russell in my “trust in God and the valor of the West,” I have an equal trust in the same Divine Being as connected with the justice of the West. I have the most perfect and undoubting reliance that, to the clear-sighted intelligence of the western country, the gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras dire, of Mr. Russell’s imagination, raised by incantation from the waters of the Mississippi, will sink as they rose, and be seen no more. Without professing to sacrifice any of those ties of duty and allegiance which bind me to the interest of my native State, I cannot allow Mr. Russell’s claim to a special ardor for the welfare of the West to be superior to my own, or to that of the deceased, or of the living colleague with whom I concurred, without mental reservation, in the measure subscribed to, and denounced by Mr. Russell. We were all the Ministers of the whole Union; and sure I am that every member of the majority would have spurned with equal disdain the idea of sacrificing the interest of any one part of the Union to that of any other, and the uncandid purpose of awakening suspicions at the source of their common authority here against the patriotism and integrity of any one of his colleagues.

I shall conclude with a passing notice of the three alternatives, which, in the postscript to the original of his letter of 14th of February, 1815, he says we might have taken instead of that which, as he alleges, we, against his will, did do. “We had,” says he, “three other ways of proceeding:

“1st. To contend for the indestructibility of the treaty of 1783; thence inferring the continuance of the fishing privilege, without saying any thing about the navigation of the Mississippi, which would have reserved our right of contesting this navigation on the grounds I have mentioned as specially applicable to it. 2. To have considered the treaty at an end, and to have offered a reasonable equivalent, wherever it might be found, for the fishing privilege. 3d. To have made this liberty a sine qua non of peace, as embraced by the principle of status ante bellum.

“To either of these propositions,” he adds, “I would have assented; but I could not consent to grant or revive the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi.”

He could not consent! He did consent: see his name subscribed to the letter from the American to the British Plenipotentiaries of 12th December, 1814, p. 44, of the Message of 25th February last.

It is, indeed, painful to remark here, and throughout this letter of Mr. Russell, how little solicitude there is discoverable to preserve even the appearance of any coincidence between his real sentiments and his professions: half his letter is an argument in form to prove that the treaty of 1783 was abrogated by the war; yet he says he would have assented to contend for its indestructibility, so long as it applied only to the defence of the fisheries, reserving his special grounds of objection to its being applied to the navigation of the Mississippi. I have shown that the indestructibility of the treaty of 1783 never was asserted by any of the American Commissioners; but that the principle that it had not been abrogated by the war, and that none of the rights stipulated and recognised in it, as belonging to the people of the United States, could be abrogated, but by their own renunciation, was at first assumed in defence of the fisheries only, and without saying any thing of the Mississippi. When, therefore, the demand for the navigation of the Mississippi came from the British Plenipotentiaries, Mr. Russell’s special objections to the application of our principle, in favor of our demand, might have been urged. But what were these special objections? I have shown that they were our own wrong—fraud and extortion upon Spain, to justify perfidy to Great Britain. Mr. Russell never did allege these objections at Ghent: and, if he had, a majority of the American Mission would assuredly have been ashamed to allege them to the British Government.

The second way of proceeding, to which Mr. Russell says he would have assented, was to consider the treaty of 1783 at an end, and offer for the fishing privilege a reasonable equivalent, wherever it might be found. And where would he have found it? He will not affirm that we had authority to offer any equivalent whatever; we had been specially instructed not to surrender them. He says he would have surrendered, and purchased them at a reasonable price again.

The third substitute, to which he says he would have assented, is the strongest of all. He says he would have made it a sine qua non of peace, as embraced by the principle of status ante bellum.

A sine qua non for the status ante bellum! And yet he could not consent to grant or revive the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi, in order to procure or preserve the fishing liberty; when the status ante bellum would have given them not only the whole treaty of 1783, but the permanent articles of the treaty of 1794; not only the navigation of the Mississippi, but unrestrained access to our territories and intercourse with our Indians.

I have shown that the most aggravated portion of Mr. Russell's charge against his colleagues of the majority—that of wilful violation of positive and unequivocal instructions, by a senseless offer to the British Plenipotentiaries, sacrificing an important western to a trifling eastern interest—is not only utterly destitute of foundation, but that it was not even made; nay, more, that it was distinctly contradicted by the letter really written by Mr. Russell at Paris, on the 11th of February, 1815. Into Mr. Russell's motive for introducing it into the duplicate of that letter, delivered by himself at the Department of State, to be communicated to the House as the letter called for by their resolution, I shall not attempt to penetrate; having, as I trust, equally shown that the charges implied in the real letter are as groundless as their aggravations in the duplicate. The professions of unfeigned respect for the integrity, talents, and judgment of those colleagues whose conduct is, in the same letter, represented as so weak, absurd, and treacherous, I can, for my own part, neither accept nor reciprocate. To have been compelled to speak, as in these remarks I have done, of a person distinguished by the favor of his country, and with whom I had been associated in a service of high interest to this Union, has been among the most painful incidents of my life. In the defence of myself and my colleagues against imputations so groundless in themselves, at first so secretly set forth, and now so wantonly promulgated before the Legislative assembly of the nation, it has been impossible entirely to separate the language of self-vindication from that of reproach. With Mr. Russell I can also rejoice that the proposal offered on the 1st of December, 1814, was rejected by the British Government; not because I believe it now more than I did then, liable to any of the dangers and mischiefs so glaring in the vaticinations of Mr. Russell, but because both the interests to which it relates have since been adjusted in a manner still more satisfactory to the United States. I rejoice, too, that this adjustment has taken place before the publication of Mr. Russell's letter could have any possible influence in defeating or retarding it. The convention of 20th of October, 1818, is the refutation of all the doctrines of Mr. Russell's letter, to which there can be no reply. It has adjusted the fishing interest upon the principle asserted by the American Mission at Ghent, but disclaimed by Mr. Russell. It has given us the boundary of latitude forty-nine, from the Lake of the Woods westward; and it has proved the total indifference of the British Government to the right of navigating the Mississippi, by their abandonment of their last claim to it, without asking an equivalent for its renunciation.

With regard to the magnitude of the fishing interest which was at stake during the negotiation at Ghent, I believe the views disclosed in Mr. Russell's letter as incorrect as the principles upon which he would have surrendered it. The notification of exclusion was from all fisheries within exclusive British jurisdiction. I have shown that, historically, Great Britain had asserted and maintained exclusive proprietary jurisdiction over the whole. Had we tamely acquiesced in her principle of forfeiture without renunciation, we should have found that her principle of exclusion embraced the whole. That a citizen of Massachusetts, acquainted with its colonial history, with the share that his countrymen had had in the conquest of a great part of these fisheries, with the deep and anxious interest in them taken by France, by Spain, by Great Britain, for centuries before the American Revolution; acquainted with the negotiations of which they had been the knot, and the wars of which they had been the prize, between the three most powerful maritime nations of modern Europe; acquainted with the profound sensibility of the whole American Union, during the Revolutionary war, to this interest, and with the inflexible energies by which it had been secured at its close; acquainted with the indissoluble links of attachment between it and the navigation, the navy, the maritime defence, the national spirit, and hardy enterprise of this great Republic: that such a citizen, stimulated to the discharge of duty by a fresh instruction from his Government, given at the most trying period of the war, upon the very first rumor of an intention, on the part of Great Britain, to demand its surrender, not to surrender it—sooner to break off the negotiation than surrender it; that such a citizen, with the dying words of Lawrence, "Don't give up the ship," still vibrating on his ear, should describe this interest "as totally unnecessary for us for subsistence or occupation," and affording, "in no honest way, either commercial facility or political advantage," as "the doubtful accommodation of a few fishermen, annually decreasing in number," is as strange and unaccountable to me as that he should deliberately sit down, two months after the treaty was concluded, and write to his Government a cold-blooded dissertation to prove that there was nothing—absolutely nothing—in the principle upon which he and his colleagues had rested its future defence; and that he considered the fishing liberty “to be entirely at an end, without a new stipulation for its revival.”

Such were not the sentiments of a majority of the American Commissioners at Ghent; such were, particularly, not the sentiments of the writer of these remarks. He reflects, with extreme satisfaction, upon that deep and earnest regard for this interest manifested, at that time, by the Executive Government of the United States, in the positive and unqualified instruction of the 25th of June, 1814, to the Commissioners, on no consideration whatever to surrender the fisheries. He rejoices that this instruction was implicitly obeyed; that the nation issued from the war with all its rights and liberties unimpaired, preserved as well from the artifices of diplomacy as from the force of preponderating power upon their element, the seas; and he trusts that the history of this transaction, in all its details, from the instruction not to surrender the fisheries to the conclusion of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, will give solemn warning to the statesmen of this Union, in their conflicts with foreign Powers, through all future time, never to consider any of the liberties of this nation as abrogated by a war, or capable of being extinguished by any other agency than our own express renunciation.

TRADE WITH THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

[Communicated to the House, February 15, 1822.]

Public Meeting.

Boston, January 28, 1822.

A meeting was this day holden at Merchants' Hall, agreeably to notice in the public newspapers, to take into consideration the propriety of remonstrating against the repeal of the navigation acts of the United States.

The honorable William Gray was called to the chair; and Samuel Parkman, jr., was chosen secretary.

The following resolutions was unanimously adopted :

Resolved, That the political power and influence which these United States have with other nations is derived from, and chiefly dependent upon, their naval power.

Resolved, That the political power and influence of a nation is essentially connected with, and operative upon, the interest of every class of citizens, inasmuch as it, affects the terms and conditions which they are enabled to obtain from foreign Powers in their commercial and political arrangements.

Resolved, That the power of a nation to establish and maintain a navy is just in proportion to the extent of her commercial marine and fisheries.

Resolved, That the navigation acts of the United States have, in their operation, been highly beneficial to the agricultural, manufacturing, and navigating interests of the country; to the agricultural and manufacturing, by creating and maintaining a constant and regular demand for their productions at fair prices; to the navigating, by protecting them against the operation of discriminating duties and commercial regulations of foreign Powers, calculated to build up and extend the commerce and navigation of other nations to the prejudice of that of the United States.

Resolved, That to repeal the navigation acts, except so far as to make them reciprocal with such nations as may repeal theirs with regard to the United States, would be destructive of the carrying trade, and highly prejudicial to the best interests of the whole community; that it would be surrendering the regulation of our commerce and navigation, one of the principal objects of the formation of this Union, into the hands of foreign Governments, whose interest it is to destroy the latter and regulate the former to suit their own interests; to secure to themselves the whole carrying trade; consequently, to augment their naval and political power, and thus to enable them to control our exports, to influence our negotiations with other nations, and, finally, to render the United States of no more consequence to any European Power than China and Japan.

Resolved, That the effect of the repeal of the navigation acts would not be to increase the trade or commerce of the United States, but only to substitute a trade with those places where we are not admitted on terms of reciprocity for a trade to the same extent with those places where we now carry on a fair and reciprocal commerce, and to transfer so much of the carrying trade as should be affected by it from vessels of the United States, and from vessels of those Powers which have made reciprocal commercial arrangements with the United States, to the vessels of those Powers which refuse to make such equal arrangements, and to do this without any motive or equivalent.

Resolved, That such a repeal would be derogatory to the national character, and unjust to those nations which have entered into fair and equitable arrangements, inasmuch as it would subject the Government of the United States to the imputation of partiality or weakness, in granting terms to nations which are selfish and illiberal in their policy towards us, which we refuse to other nations that are magnanimous and just.

Resolved, That restrictions on commerce, high duties, taxing one interest for the benefit of another interest, and partial and illiberal discriminations between the vessels of one nation and those of another ought not to be resorted to, except so far as may be necessary for the purposes of revenue, or, in self-defence, to protect our own citizens from the effects of illiberal regulations or unjust impositions by foreign Powers.

Resolved, That we approve the measures taken by the General Government in regard to the regulation of our commercial intercourse with foreign nations as just and liberal to other Governments and honorable to our own.

A committee, consisting of the following gentlemen, viz: the honorable William Gray, Nathaniel Goddard, Willard Phillips, William Sturgis, and Thomas Wigglesworth, Esqs., was appointed to draught a memorial to Congress, in conformity, to the foregoing resolves, offer it to the citizens for their signatures, and to forward the same to our member of Congress, to be laid before that body.

The committee was also requested to correspond with gentlemen in other parts of the Union, and request their co-operation.

It was then voted that the secretary of this meeting cause these doings, with the resolves, to be published in the newspapers.

WILLIAM GRAY, Chairman.

SAMUEL PARKMAN, JR., Secretary.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled :

The memorial of the undersigned, merchants, ship-owners, and others, inhabitants of Boston, respecting the law relating to trade with foreign colonies, respectfully represents: That the reciprocal terms of commercial intercourse proposed to foreign nations by this country appear to the undersigned to present the fair and just principles of mutual trade; and, after those principles have been assented to by so many nations, and their beneficial influence has been so clearly demonstrated by the security and stability thereby given to our commercial relations, without impairing our navigation and commerce, the undersigned would regret any desire on the part of any portion of their fellow-citizens to disturb the operation of those principles, and induce the nation to abandon them. They would be the more concerned at the appearance of this disposition, because they believe that when a nation consents to continue its intercourse with another upon disadvantageous terms, it begins to submit the industry and enterprise of its people to the control of such other nation, and render them subservient to its policy. One concession invites the demand of another, and one branch of industry is surrendered after another, as long as any remains to be surrendered.

The navigation of this country lies under a disadvantage in comparison with that of foreigners, owing to the higher price of labor, and of most, if not all, of the materials used in building and equipping vessels, with the single exception of lumber. If, besides struggling with this disadvantage, our industry and skill are left exposed to the restrictive regulations of foreign Governments designed to favor their own navigation, it will be impossible for our citizens to maintain a competition upon equal terms, and an entire freedom from all restrictions, which affords an argument of equal force both against attempting to impose any, and against submitting to them; and the abstaining from such attempt in regard to foreign navigation, and the prompt counteraction of it when made against our own, seem to be parts of the same policy. The truth of these observations appears to be clearly and forcibly illustrated as well by the good effects on all parties of an impartial system of commercial regulations, as far as it has been adopted, as by the success of the recent measures of our own Government for counteracting foreign restrictions. Without such measures, an important branch of our carrying trade was passing entirely into foreign vessels, by the effect of the preference given them in the ports of the country to which they belonged; and by the operation of such measures, our trade, without being diminished, has been brought into channels where our own shipping has a fair competition.

Where no commercial treaty exists to determine the measures to be adopted by a foreign nation on this subject, it may be fairly presumed that the acts of such a nation will be determined by its interest; and since our exports to Europe consist mainly of articles intended for manufacture, and our imports thence of articles manufactured, it is plain that our trade with any European nation has a double effect in promoting the arts and industry, and increasing the population of such country, by giving a cheap and plentiful supply of materials to be used in their arts, as well as by taking off their hands, at the same time, great quantities of the products of those arts. It may, therefore, be fairly presumed that this obvious interest will, in general, be a sufficient inducement for any European nation to carry on a trade with this country, without any exclusive privilege to its own navigation; and, if it be not so, it is not possible to know, without first ascertaining the fact by treaty, what exclusive advantages would be deemed sufficient. If more than the advantages naturally resulting from the trade is demanded, it would seem that such a demand must be made, not because these advantages are an inadequate inducement, but because it is calculated that the United States will concede something more, and will not be as ready to make a small sacrifice, if it be requisite, as such nation is to forego an important interest.

From these considerations, it would be matter of regret to the undersigned if any dissatisfaction were felt in regard to the present state of our laws relating to trade with the British West Indies, which appear to be founded upon the principles above stated, and conformably to those which have been recently proposed and pursued by the Government of this country. It cannot but be recollected that the standing laws of Great Britain, while they admit many articles the growth and production of American colonies belonging to European sovereigns to be imported into the British West Indies in vessels of the subjects of such sovereigns, studiously exclude all articles whatever the growth and production of the United States, in American vessels; and though this system has been heretofore so far modified as to admit of an intercourse through some intermediate ports in the British possessions near the United States, whereby Great Britain proposed to open a market in this country for its superfluous West India productions, and at the same time secure to its own shipping the freight of such productions, it is believed that the interruption of this trade by the act of Congress passed the 15th day of May, 1820, has been materially advantageous to the navigation, without being in any considerable degree, if at all, prejudicial to the trade of this country. If there were objections to this trade, it is apprehended that there are still stronger, and, indeed, the most conclusive reasons against the admission of British West India productions exclusively in British vessels into our ports. In the first place, the principal article of trade permitted by Great Britain from its West India possessions to this country is not of a kind to invite or justify any special encouragement. But, supposing it to be a trade deserving encouragement as far as the kind of merchandise is concerned, and supposing, also, that the permission of this trade, carried on in British bottoms, would not diminish our trade to the other islands of the West Indies, still it would be likely more or less to affect our carrying trade to Europe. In the present universal and active circulation of property throughout the commercial world, one branch of trade is much implicated with others, and the exclusive possession of one branch, as by the British shipping in this case, has more or less tendency to draw all those connected with it into the same hands. This trade, in which our own vessels could take no part, would necessarily bring many British vessels into our ports, bound to and from Europe, and a portion of the freights between Europe and this country would naturally be transferred to those vessels.

Such would be the disadvantage to our navigation on the supposition that our trade to other ports of the West Indies would not be diminished. But there can be no doubt that it would be materially diminished. We now have a trade in our own vessels to a large proportion of the West Indies, composing from two-thirds to three-quarters, whether in the ratio of population or of the amount of production and consumption; and from the ports thus open to us we can procure sufficient quantities of all kinds of West India productions to supply our demand for domestic consumption and for re-exportation. It cannot be supposed that opening a trade with the British West Indies by British vessels would increase this demand, but it would supply it just in proportion to the extent of such trade, and, consequently, would take away just so much of the carrying trade from our own shipping; and every cargo brought from the West Indies to this country in a British vessel would deprive one of our own vessels of a freight, or at least of a fair competition in obtaining it from the other West India islands.

The advantages proposed by the admission of British vessels into our ports from the West Indies are the opening a market for our lumber and provisions, and it may perhaps be proposed to raise some little additional revenue by an extra tonnage duty or otherwise. The revenue accruing from this source, if any can be realized, must be too trifling to be a matter of any material consideration, and, were it practicable to make it of any considerable amount, it would be raising a revenue at the expense of our carrying trade, and, consequently, of our navigation, which would be a departure from what is understood to have been the uniform policy and unquestionable interest of this country. The same argument might be alleged for transferring all our carrying trade to foreign bottoms if this could be done. It has never been any part of our system of policy to raise a revenue by the discouragement or limitation of any branch of the national industry, and more especially one so intimately connected with the safety, not to mention the glory of the nation.

In regard to lumber, it is well known to be the policy of Great Britain to supply itself as well as its West India possessions with this article from its colonies on this continent; and we have no proofs of a disposition to relax this policy in favor of the United States, but many to the contrary. Whatever may be the effect of its present regulations of this trade, we have no security, without a commercial treaty, that they will be continued, and we might be deprived of the whole of the trade the moment we had conceded what should be considered an equivalent for it. The whole of this trade, in such articles as are at all permitted, might probably amount to something over half a million of dollars—an amount of trade not sufficient to compensate for the abandonment of principles of commercial policy in which the national prosperity is deeply concerned. But when it is considered that we might at the best obtain only a share of this trade, and that it more probably would be wholly interdicted, any calculation upon this advantage seems to be a basis too frail for the support of any important measure.

The same remarks apply in some degree to the trade in provisions. But our exports of provisions would not be increased by the whole amount carried directly from the United States to the British West Indies in British vessels in the case of this exclusive trade being permitted, since the whole demand in the British West Indies would not be thereby increased; and as there is now a trade carried on in articles of this description in our own vessels to other parts of the West Indies, and a trade in similar articles between those places and the British islands, there can be no doubt that the demand in the ports to which we trade is affected by the supplies that go from those ports to the British possessions. This cause will operate to enhance the demand for these articles in those ports, notwithstanding any laws that should be enacted prohibiting the importation from such ports into the British colonies of any products of the United States, however rigorously such laws might be enforced.

For these reasons, it is respectfully represented that it is not expedient to make any change in the existing laws of this country in relation to the trade with the British West Indies, unless the terms on which the trade is to be pursued can be first ascertained by stipulations on the subject.

Boston, February 4, 1822.

TRADE WITH THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

[Communicated to the Senate, March 15, 1822.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

The memorial of the subscribers, ship-owners, and others interested in foreign commerce, in the town of Portsmouth, and State of New Hampshire, respectfully represents :

That, in the year 1817, they addressed a memorial to Congress, in which they set forth the various embarrassments and disadvantages to which they were subjected from the unequal operation of the navigation laws of foreign nations, and praying such relief as the wisdom of Congress might devise.

That, in common with their fellow-citizens of other commercial towns, they witnessed with much satisfaction the measures adopted by the General Government, particularly in the acts of Congress of April, 1818, and May, 1820, to retain the carrying trade, as far as possible, for our own vessels, and to prevent the ruinous competition of foreign vessels with our own in our own ports ; that, though your memorialists are in general opposed to commercial restrictions, and to discriminating duties between the vessels of one nation and those of another, they deeply feel the injustice as well as the impolicy of granting to foreign nations privileges which they deny to us, and thus in effect offering a bounty to foreign ships at the expense of those of our own country.

That, persuaded as they are, upon principle, of the propriety of our existing navigation laws, it has given them much pleasure to observe their favorable effect upon the tonnage of the United States. It appears that in 1818 the amount of American tonnage employed in foreign trade was 755,101, and of foreign tonnage in the ports of the United States 161,413 tons. In 1820 the American tonnage was 861,253, and the foreign 79,200 tons : thus making in two years an increase of American tonnage of 106,152, and a decrease of foreign tonnage of 82,213 tons. In other words, two years ago 21.100 of the trade of the United States was carried on in foreign bottoms, while at present only 9.100 is conveyed in foreign ships—a most striking proof of the advantage of these laws.

But there are other considerations connected with this subject to which your memorialists cannot be insensible, and to which they doubt not your attention has already been directed. The repeal of these laws would add directly to the riches and power and strength of a nation that feels no disposition to meet the United States upon terms of mutual concession and freedom. Great Britain framed her acts of navigation a century and a half ago, for the purpose, as was avowed at the time, of “clipping the wings of her opulent and aspiring neighbors, the Dutch.” She has ever since been tenacious of these laws as the great preservative of her commercial marine, and, of course, as the foundation of her naval strength. Our navigation acts were designed to protect our citizens against the operation of this foreign system ; and to repeal them at this time, without some reciprocal relaxation on the part of Great Britain, would be, as your memorialists apprehend, to surrender the character as well as the interests of the nation.

Your memorialists, therefore, respectfully pray that the present system of navigation laws in the United States may not be abandoned, whatever modifications may be made in their provisions ; and, as a brief expression of their opinions and feelings on this subject, they would present the following resolutions which were passed at a numerous meeting of the merchants and ship-owners, and others interested in foreign commerce, holden at Portsmouth on the 18th of February instant.

Resolved, That we have witnessed with entire approbation the measures pursued by the Government of the United States, especially in the years 1818 and 1820, for the regulation of our commerce with foreign nations.

Resolved, That, in our opinion, the navigation acts of the United States have been highly favorable to our merchants, ship-owners, and mariners, by increasing the amount of American tonnage, and favoring the employment of American seamen.

Resolved, That the repeal of the navigation acts at the present time would be highly injurious to the commerce of the United States, as it would place the vessels of foreign nations in a more favorable situation for commercial enterprises than those of our own country, and would thus transfer the whole carrying trade to foreign nations without any reciprocal concessions on their part.

Resolved, That a memorial to Congress be prepared expressing these opinions, and praying that the present system of navigation laws be maintained, unless foreign nations will consent to a mutual relaxation of such prohibitory laws, upon terms of mutual concession.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, with our request that they use their exertions to carry the same into effect.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H., Feb'y, 1822.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE WITH FOREIGN NATIONS.

[Communicated to the House, March 15, 1822.]

Mr. NEWTON made the following report :

The Committee on Commerce, to whom were submitted so much of the President's Message as concerns the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, and all other matters relating to the commerce of the United States; the memorials and petitions of the citizens and merchants of sundry cities, towns, and counties, praying for a repeal of the navigation acts of the 18th of April, 1818, and of the 15th of May, 1820; and the memorials and petitions of the citizens and merchants of sundry cities and towns, remonstrating against the repeal of the said acts, beg leave respectfully to report:

The committee are duly impressed with a sense of the importance of the duties which have been assigned to them. Their weight would at any time be felt, but the circumstances which have made it necessary for them to act have increased it, by awakening a solicitude they know not how to express.

They regret the necessity for the following reasons:

First. Because the opposition to the policy pursued by the Government, though it originates, they are persuaded, in the purest motives, will have the inauspicious effect of preventing for a time the success of that policy. And

Secondly. Because the subjects inseparably connected with it are of such magnitude, that the committee, whose duties have been various and arduous, have not had sufficient time to bestow on them that deliberate consideration they deserve. These subjects, from their extent, and always difficult, have at this conjuncture become peculiarly embarrassing and delicate from the condition in which most of the nations of Europe are placed. A new political era has commenced; new relations among nations forming; new channels for commerce opening; and the old commercial system giving way for the introduction of one more liberal and enlightened. These changes, evident to all, should have produced a pause; there never was a time that required more serious required more serious reflection, never one more prudence or circumspection. In political affairs, it is no easy matter to recover from a false step. By standing still, our chance for acquiring advantages is much greater than by acting. In the first place, we rely, as we should, on principles that are in successful operation, and on which we should depend for freedom of commerce. In the second, by changing our policy, and rejecting the best means which can secure to it that freedom, we sanction the restrictive principles that have depressed it. This Government has ever been disposed to act with fairness and justice to all nations. It has never asked for a favor from any which it has been unwilling to reciprocate. From the time the Constitution went into operation to the present, this Government has uniformly manifested a disposition to open a free commercial intercourse with every nation. If its just views have not been met in a like liberal spirit, the Government cannot be otherwise than conscious that it has discharged, to the utmost of its ability, the duties assigned it; and it cannot but derive great consolation from the reflection that the American people, when they shall understand the motives which have influenced its deliberations and directed its councils, will justly appreciate the policy which it has been compelled, from principles of self-preservation, reluctantly to adopt.

The committee now proceed to give a concise view of the commerce of the United States. This they will endeavor to make as plain, but as comprehensive, as the time allowed them will permit. In order to accomplish this object, they have divided the time between the peace of 1783, and the 30th of September, 1821, into four periods. The first period to begin at the peace of 1783, and to end which the Constitution went into operation, in the year 1789. A transient view of the commerce of the United States during that time will show the causes why it did not flourish; and that, among the reasons urged for changing the old confederative form of government for the present Constitution, the prevailing one was, that the affairs of commerce should be under the sole regulation of Congress, and that the National Government should be vested with competent powers to countervail the restrictive commercial policy of foreign nations. The second period to commence from the time when the Constitution went into operation, and to end when war was declared against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof. The third, from the declaration of war, in 1812, to the general pacification of Europe and the Treaty of Ghent.* And the fourth and last, from the general peace in Europe and the Treaty of Ghent, to the 30th of September, 1821.

The first period of time presents a state of affairs that must have given to every American, the first wish of whose heart was the honor and prosperity of his country, the deepest concern.

Our independence as a nation was acknowledged, but we were disappointed as to the immediate advantages we expected to derive from that glorious event. Every nation considered the infant republic as a rival, and circumscribed within the narrowest limits its rights and privileges.† As it is the duty of your committee to confine their views to the commerce of the United States during that period, they will succinctly sketch not its rise and progress, but humbly record the causes of its declension and decay. At no period of our history has commerce ever been in so languishing a condition. It was under the worst management, having thirteen independent sovereignties for guardians, each claiming and exercising independent powers over its concerns. The Confederation could make, but, not having the power to enforce treaties, its overtures to make them were by Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal rejected. Other pretexts were not wanting. They knew that an inefficient Government gave great advantages to them, and they were determined to convert them to their use. The navigation acts of Great Britain were rigorously executed; and other nations, averse to permit the United States to participate in a commerce which it was their desire exclusively to enjoy, restricted their commercial intercourse with them in such a manner as to leave no chance of successful competition. The Confederation having no navy to protect commerce, and not being able, from the want of funds, to purchase, by tribute, its safety from the piratical Powers of Barbary, no commercial intercourse could be had with the nations bordering on the shores of the Mediterranean. The depredations of those freebooters were connived at by nations able to protect their commerce, as the best means that State policy could suggest to obtain the monopoly of that of nations unable to protect theirs. Jealous and conflicting regulations of the States, obstructing commercial enterprise in every branch, and the want of exclusive and efficient powers in the federal head to assert and vindicate its rights, left it to the mercy of foreign nations, whose restrictions were dictated in a spirit either of cupidity or hostility. The merchants of every part of the Union, alive to the injuries they were suffering, expressed with freedom and patriotic indignation their complaints. Congress and the State Legislatures heard with patience and pain their grievances. The merchants asked for protection, but could obtain sympathy only. As the representations of those who suffer real injuries are always impressive, your committee cannot refrain from giving, in their own style and manner, their complaints.

"General discontent prevailed with respect to the course of trade. It had commenced with the native merchants of the North, who found themselves incapable of contending in their own ports with certain foreigners, and was soon communicated to others. The gazettes of Boston contained some very animated and angry addresses, and produced resolutions for the government of the citizens of that town;* applications to their State Legislatures; a petition to Congress; and a circular letter to the merchants of several seaports throughout the United States. After detailing the disadvantages under which the navigation and trade of America labored in consequence of the free admission of the ships and commodities of Great Britain into their ports, while their navigation, in return, was discouraged, and their exports either prohibited from entering British ports, or loaded with rigorous restrictions; after stating the ruin which must result from the continuance of such a system, and their confidence that the necessary powers to the Federal Government would be soon, if not already, delegated, the petition to Congress thus concludes:

"Impressed with these ideas, your petitioners beg leave to request of the very august body which they have now the honor to address that the numerous impositions of the British on the trade and exports of these States may be forthwith contravened by similar expedients on our part; else the commerce of this country, and, of consequence, its wealth, and perhaps the Union itself, may become victims to the artifice of a nation whose arms have been in vain exerted to accomplish the ruin of America."

* Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. 5, p. 76.

The merchants of Philadelphia presented a memorial to the Legislature of that State, in which, after lamenting it as a general defect in the Constitution that full and entire power over the commerce of the United States had not been originally vested in Congress, as no concern common to many could be conducted to a good end but by unity of councils, they say: "Hence it is that the intercourses of the States are liable to be perplexed and injured by various and discordant regulations, instead of that harmony of measures on which the particular as well as general interests depend, productive of mutual disgusts and alienation among the several members of the empire." "But the more certain inconveniences foreseen, and now experimentally felt, flow from the unequal footings this circumstance puts us on with other nations, and by which we stand in a very singular and disadvantageous situation; for, while the whole of our trade is laid open to these nations, they are at liberty to limit us to such branches of theirs as interest or policy may dictate, unrestrained by any apprehension, as long as the power remains severally with the States, of being met and opposed by any consistent and effectual restrictions on our part."

This view, with the statement of facts, is respectfully submitted without a comment, as none that your committee can make can exhibit, during this period of time, more strongly the humiliating condition of the commerce of the United States.

During this period, our imports greatly exceeded our exports. (For the amount of tonnage, see document A No. 1.)

The second period of our time commences with the operation of the Constitution of the United States, the adoption of which was regarded as an event of the greatest importance, involving in itself nothing less than the continuance of the Union and the prosperity of the nation. The Constitution confers on Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State; no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another." "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any impost or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of Congress." From these clauses of the Constitution, it evidently appears that the people of the United States deliberately and solemnly granted to Congress, exclusively, the power to regulate commerce; and this was done because they had seen the fatal consequences that attended the exercise of it, severally, by thirteen independent sovereignties, and because they were practically convinced "that no concern common to many could be conducted to a good end but by a unity of councils." They were satisfied that measures which should be taken with respect to the foreign relations and commercial concerns of the United States would require a policy steady and circumspect, and time and secrecy to mature it. They confided this power to the National Government, making the Representatives whom they should elect to administer it solely responsible for the proper execution of the power thus intrusted.

These clauses from the Constitution show, beyond all doubt, that the people, after taking away from the States all power concerning the foreign relations and the commercial concerns of the United States, and by so doing, of course, all the means of acquiring accurate information touching matters delicate and important in their nature, intended that their Representatives should be left to pursue, by unity of councils, the completion of that course of measures which their convictions, wrought by a full view of the subject in all its bearings, should dictate as necessary to promote the general interest and welfare. Were any of the constituted authorities of the States to interpose in such matters, such interposition would again introduce the same evils, the recurrence of which it was the intention and design of the people to prevent by adopting the Constitution. The people created, and they can destroy whenever they will it, the Constitution; but they will never knowingly destroy a form of Government which has made the United States a nation among nations; and they are too just to make their Representatives, possessing as they do plenary powers over foreign relations and commerce, responsible for failures either in policy or negotiations from measures not originating with them.

Great expectations were indulged that the navigation and trade of the United States, feeling the invigorating impulses of a National Government, would revive, and possess almost the attribute of ubiquity.

How flattering soever they have been, yet, to the eyes of men whose zeal and judgment were temperate and cool, the prospects appeared in many respects deeply shaded. Coeval with the operation of the Constitution was the commencement of the French Revolution. The same principles and feelings gave birth to both; but, taking a different direction in their developement and display, the destiny allotted to each marks, under the dispensation of a wise Providence, the great influence of times and circumstances in the fate of nations. As it is made the duty of your committee to notice and record the progress of the commerce of the United States, they beg leave to quote the following passage from Seybert's Statistical Annals, which presents, in a concise view, some of the principal causes that have contributed to give to commerce, during this period, momentum and enterprise.

"Independent of our newly acquired political character, circumstances arose in Europe by which a new and extensive field was presented for our commercial enterprise. The most memorable of revolutions was commenced in France in 1789; the wars consequent to that event created a demand for our exports, and invited our shipping for the carrying trade of a very considerable portion of Europe; we not only carried the colonial productions to the several parent States, but we also became the purchasers of them in the French, Spanish, and Dutch colonies. A new era was established in our commercial history; the individuals who partook of these advantages were numerous; our catalogue of merchants was swelled much beyond what it was entitled to be from the state of our population. Many persons who had secured moderate capitals soon became the most adventurous. The predominant spirit of that time has had a powerful effect in determining the character of the rising generation in the United States. The brilliant prospects held out by commerce, caused our citizens to neglect the mechanical and manufacturing branches of industry; fallacious views, founded on temporary circumstances, carried us from these pursuits, which must ultimately constitute the resources, wealth, and power of this nation. Temporary benefits were mistaken for permanent advantages; so certain were the profits on the foreign voyages, that commerce was only pursued as an art; all the knowledge which former experience had considered as essentially necessary was now unattended to; the philosophy of commerce (if I am allowed the expression) was totally neglected; the nature of foreign productions was but little investigated by the shippers of the United States; the demand in Europe for foreign merchandise, especially for that of the West Indies and South America, secured to all these cargoes a ready sale with a great profit; the most adventurous became the most wealthy, and that without the knowledge of any of the principles which govern commerce under ordinary circumstances; no one was limited to any one branch of trade; the same individual was concerned in voyages to Asia, South America, the West Indies, and Europe. Our tonnage increased in a ratio with the extended catalogue of the exports; we seemed to have arrived at the maximum of human prosperity; in proportion to our population, we ranked as the most commercial nation; in point of value, our trade was only second to that of Great Britain.

"The merchants who had been long engaged in trade were confounded by the changes which were so suddenly effected; the less experienced considered the newly acquired advantages as matters of right, and that they would remain to us; they did not contemplate a period of general peace, when each nation will carry its own productions, when discriminations will be made in favor of domestic tonnage, when foreign commerce will be limited to enumerated articles, and when much circumspection will be necessary in all our commercial transactions."

This passage forcibly illustrates the nature of the commerce of the United States during that period. It had acquired an impetus which was accidental, and the advantages arising from which could but be transient. The condition of commerce at that time gave a wildness to speculation and enterprise, which a change of circumstances seems not capable of bringing back to the rationale of a peace commerce. The erratic course it then pursued prepared for the time of peace a bitter portion for many who, destitute of experience, and regardless of the dictates of prudence, had boldly ventured on a sea they had not skill to navigate. The failures which took place at the peace, and soon after it, may be traced to commercial enterprises made on deceptive calculations. The facts on which the estimates made of a peace commerce are unfortunately drawn from that period, than which there cannot be a greater or more dangerous fallacy; and which will, if persevered in, continue to warp the judgment, inflame the public mind, and fatally depress that commerce which it is the common wish and interest of every lover of his country to promote and extend.

Your committee forbear to enlarge here on this point, as in another part of this report it will more properly come under their consideration.

They will now state such acts as were passed after the organization of the present Government for the encouragement of navigation and commerce.* Attention was given with as little delay as possible to these subjects. On the 20th July, 1789, an act passed imposing duties on tonnage; this laid a duty of six cents per ton on all vessels owned by citizens of the United States on the 29th of May, 1789, whether such be domestic or foreign built.† On ships or vessels built in the United States after the 20th July, 1790, but belonging wholly, or in part, to subjects of foreign Powers, at the rate of thirty cents per ton; and on all other ships or vessels at the rate of fifty cents per ton.

"The extra duties imposed by the act of the 29th of May on the tonnage of foreign nations, and which were continued by the act of 20th July, 1790, and the extra duty of ten per centum additional on all the rates of duty imposed on merchandise imported in American vessels by the act of 10th August, 1790, when such merchandise is imported in vessels not of the United States, constitute what are usually called the discriminating duties."‡

The discriminating duties had a good effect on the navigation of the United States. They enabled it to come into competition with the foreign with the greater prospects of success. The tonnage certainly increased.

"These extra charges on the navigation and commerce of foreign nations were sufficient to drive from our ports the greatest proportion of the foreign tonnage. All foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted in favor of the ship-owners in the United States. The diminution of the foreign tonnage employed in our trade was, with very few exceptions, rapid, regular, and permanent."§

No doubt is entertained that the acts mentioned had a beneficial effect, but the state of Europe contributed not a little, as has been observed, to encourage and extend navigation and commerce. The laws allowing the drawback of duties on merchandise exported within twelve months from the time of importation have given to American commercial enterprise an extensive field for exertion, and enabled our merchants to profit by markets which, without such privileges, they could not have resorted to.

Other laws were passed during this period increasing the duties on tonnage and merchandise, which, for the time they were in force, might have had some good effect; but as they were temporary, and passed with no view of forming a system for promoting navigation, your committee forbear to give them any particular notice. In another part of this report the commercial relations in which the United States stand to other nations, and the changes which those relations have produced, will receive the attention to which they are justly entitled.

Your committee, in order to make a fair representation of the condition of commerce during this period, feel themselves constrained to state some of the losses to which it was subjected by the captures made of American vessels, with their cargoes.

The facts here given preclude the necessity of many comments. Political weakness gives encouragement to rapacity and avarice; and the same scenes will be renewed if the same cause should exist. What privileges should be gratuitously conferred on the actors of such atrocities? What sacrifices should be made to enable them to act over again their parts? Should future wars convulse nations, the patriotism of an enlightened Legislature is called upon to decide. It is fortunate for the destinies of this nation that the influence of experience is never lost on those who are to direct them.

It was stated in the House of Peers that six hundred American vessels were seized or detained in British ports between the 6th of November, 1793, and the 28th of March, 1794.—Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, vol. iv., p. 285.

The above account, Dr. Seybert says, presents a fair view of the distressed condition of our foreign commerce at a time when we were said to be at peace with all nations. (p. 81.)

Under the 7th article of the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, a board of commissioners was organized and empowered to settle claims for American vessels captured and detained by British ships of war. The amount of the claims allowed cannot now be ascertained, as the records of the commissioners were lost by fire during the late war; the sum paid, it is supposed, fell far short of the losses sustained. No compensation for captures of vessels with their cargoes from 1803 to 1812 was ever made.

By the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, our Government obtained for our citizens who suffered by French spoliation on our commerce about $3,750,000; and by the late treaty with Spain, ceding the Floridas to the United States, the sum of $5,000,000 was likewise obtained as an indemnification for spoliations committed on our commerce by Spanish cruisers, &c.

These indemnifications can in nowise be considered adequate to the immense losses that our merchants sustained.

The third period comprehends the time from the declaration of war against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, to the general pacification of Europe and the Treaty of Ghent.

The commerce of the United States during this war was greatly depressed, and our exports and imports were, of course, much reduced. The documents annexed will furnish the facts necessary to show the extent and value of our commerce at that time.

Many considerations give a deep interest to this eventful period. The change of relations from peace (if peace it could be called when the United States were suffering passively every injury) to those of war, in which they could retort injury for injury, was awful and momentous.

The issue to them was peace, with dignity and prosperity, or disunion, with the domination of a victorious and vindictive enemy. The causes of the war were many: the principal were the impressment of our seamen, and the wanton destruction of our commerce. As a young nation, Great Britain determined to prevent our growth openly and insidiously. Her ruling statesmen and the advocates for monarchy everywhere hesitated not to express with confidence an opinion that the Constitution of the United States, destitute of energy, could not maintain the national rights, and that, whenever this nation should, under its auspices, assert them, the Constitution would perish in the agitations of war. No wonder can, therefore, be excited that such impressions should influence foreign Governments in the course of policy they observed to this nation. No Government felt that influence in a higher degree than that of Great Britain. The times produced in public affairs a crisis, the determination of which filled with anxious solicitude every American breast. The enemies of the United States congratulated themselves that the time had arrived of effecting their humiliation by the dissolution of the Union. The course the American Government had to take was difficult. On every side was seen but a choice of evils. Every expedient that policy or ingenuity could suggest for the preservation of peace with honor was resorted to. Negotiations were opened, but with diplomatic and sarcastic levity the American Government was told that justice to the United States was inconsistent "with the maritime rights of Great Britain."

All efforts of a conciliatory nature were considered proofs of imbecility, and the experience of every day convinced the Government that justice would never be voluntarily rendered to this nation until the energies of the Constitution, tried and not found wanting in war, should extort and command it. It was in vain, after such unequivocal manifestations of hostility, to look for the enjoyment of peace with dignity. Wrongs, aggravated by insults, determined the Government of the United States to appeal to the sword, and to depend alone on Providence and the justice of its cause for a successful issue.

The war exhibited scenes of horror from which the eye of Alaric would have turned with pain.

It acquired for our Republican institutions a character of practical efficiency, and elevated the United States to the first rank among nations. The army gallantly performed its duty; but, as the navy has an intimate connexion with the subject under consideration, your committee have particularly noticed this period as the commencement of an era which, fortunate for the future success of commerce, raised and gave reputation to the arm destined to protect its rights; and that arm will be able to protect its rights if the navigation of the United States, the nursery of its strength and efficiency, shall not be sacrificed by a vacillating policy.

The committee now turn their attention to the fourth and last period, which comprehends the time from the general pacification of Europe and the Treaty of Ghent to the 30th of September, 1821. Since the peace, each nation, as far as it has the ability to do it, supplies its wants from its own resources, and encourages its own navigation. The field for commercial enterprise is of the same extent, the harvest is not less abundant, but the competition, among those who are contending for a share of it, much greater. The portion falling to the lot of each will depend on the exertions of patient, never-tiring labor. To the active and persevering, prospects are cheering; but to visionaries, who enjoy wealth in dreams, and wake but to behold the delusion, there can be no hope. Let the Government do what it will, it can never throw on such the sunshine of prosperity.

This is the only period since 1789, with the exception of the peace of Amiens, which lasted but a short time, that the nations of Europe have stood in the relations of peace and amity to each other. The facts on which to found an estimate, or probable conjecture of what will be the nature, extent, and value of the commerce of the United States with foreign nations during the continuance of peace, should from this period be collected. Your committee regret that this comprehends too small a portion of time to furnish those necessary for a fair and just one. They are fully apprized of the necessity of giving as correct information as they can on subjects of the first importance. They have no interest to deceive, nor do they, while performing their duty, look to other objects. They deprecate mischiefs that are produced by partial views, because their destructive effects are seldom repaired, even by the wisest patriots. The commerce of the United States consists of many distinct branches; the most valuable the Government should by proper means endeavor to secure from injury, and to make the least valuable productive. Your committee would absolve themselves from the observance of every principle they are bound to regard, were they, in discharging their duties, to devote their attention solely to one branch. As the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations will be greater or less in proportion to the demand for the produce of the United States, your committee feel themselves constrained to glance the eye over some of the countries with which the United States have, and probably will have, under various modifications, commercial intercourse; to notice incidentally some of the changes that have been made, and their effects. The revolution in France agitated the whole civilized world. Europe, in particular, felt its effects. Many important changes have, and, from appearances, it is likely many more will take place. Events are in quick succession; and no man is wise enough to tell when the revolutionary tempest will cease. Be that as it may, a new order of things has been produced by the convulsions of Europe. The civil and political institutions of States and empires in that quarter of the world begin evidently to regard the rights and happiness of the people more than they formerly did. In France, the property of the soil has become more equally distributed, by the sale, during the revolution, of the landed estates of the privileged orders. The feudal impressions have been abolished, and the rights of persons and property are better secured at this than at any former period.

A new spirit of industry and enterprise has arisen, and France begins to feel its genial influence. The revolutions now existing and progressing in Spain and Portugal, having the same objects in view, will, in all human probability, revive the energies of those countries. Few possess better climates and a finer soil, and none greater advantages for extensive commerce.

Great Britain is looking on this eventful period with no little solicitude; restrictions imposed by her monopolizing policy are so effectually retorted, as to inspire more liberal notions.

A disposition is evidently manifested by her to meet other nations on the ground of reciprocity, and trust her success in commerce to free and open competition. To accelerate this happy change, to realize it, the measures which have wrought that disposition should not be rashly and inconsiderately abandoned.

When the voyage is nearly at an end, when the destined port is in view, it would be temerity in the pilot to keep at sea, and expose to the mercy of the winds and waves the lives and fortunes of those intrusted to his skill and care. This concise view is presented to the considerate and dispassionate, for the purpose of showing that the productions of the United States may be in less demand in those countries than they have heretofore been. Better cultivated than formerly, some of those countries will become competitors with us in the markets of nations less fortunate in climate and soil. New sources of supplying grain are opening. Odessa, on the Black Sea, which, in 1792, was a Tartar camp, under another name, now contains a population of 40,000 souls. From that port, in 1815, were shipped to Leghorn, Naples, Genoa, Marseilles, and other ports, 6,000,000 bushels of wheat. In 1817, 3,000,000 bushels were shipped to the single port of Leghorn. Other places contribute, but in less quantities, grain, to meet the demand that may exist.* But, as it is not the intention of the committee to be tedious in the enumeration of places from which grain and other articles can be obtained, they content themselves with stating a few facts. They plainly show that the want of demand in Europe for the produce of the United States, particularly flour and breadstuffs, arises from causes over which the American Government can have no control.

The nations with which the United States have, and those with which they have not, commerce founded on principles of reciprocity, will now be stated; they are as follows:

1st. Great Britain.—In the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, vessels of the United States are placed on the same footing with British vessels. They are subjected to the payment of the same tonnage duties and charges, and their cargoes pay the same duties as when imported in British vessels; and British vessels arriving in the ports of the United States from His Majesty's dominions in Europe pay the same tonnage duties, and the same duties on their cargoes, that our vessels are required to pay, and no more. These privileges are secured by the convention agreed on by both nations in 1815, which convention was renewed by the fourth article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818. This convention is limited to ten years. The importations into each country are confined to the produce and manufactures of the respective countries.

2d. Sweden.—By a treaty agreed on between the United States and the King of Sweden and Norway, a liberal commercial intercourse is established. The treaty is to be in force for the term of eight years from the exchange of ratification, to wit, from the 27th of May, 1818.

By the provisions of this treaty, the produce and manufactures of the United States, when imported into the ports of Sweden and Norway in vessels of the United States, pay the same duties as would be exacted were they imported in Swedish or Norwegian vessels; and the produce and manufactures of Sweden and Norway, when imported into the United States in Swedish or Norwegian vessels, pay the same duties as when imported in vessels of the United States.

In the ports of both nations there is an equality of tonnage duties.

The provisions of this treaty extend to the colony of St. Bartholomew, and to the vessels of the inhabitants thereof, provided the owners are there established and naturalized, and shall have caused their vessels to be naturalized.

The act of Congress which passed the 3d of March, 1815, proposes to each commercial nation fair and liberal terms of commerce; it speaks a plain and intelligible language to each nation. It says: Receive the vessels of the United States into your ports loaded with the produce and manufactures of the United States on the same terms and conditions you receive your own vessels into your ports importing the same articles of merchandise, and your vessels importing into the United States the produce and manufactures of your country shall be received into the ports of the United States on the same terms and conditions that vessels of the United States are received into ports of the United States importing the same articles of merchandise.

The terms offered by this act have been acceded to by the Netherlands, by Prussia, and by the Hanseatic towns of Hamburg and Bremen.

3d. France.—The extra duties imposed in 1817 by the French Government on the produce of the United States, when imported into France in vessels of the United States, have excluded them from a competition with French vessels carrying American produce to France. Feeling the injustice of such impositions on the part of France, the merchants memorialized Congress. On consideration of their complaints, an act passed the 15th of May, 1820, subjecting French vessels entering the ports of the United States to a tonnage duty of eighteen dollars a ton after the 1st day of July, 1820. The vessels which arrived in the United States without having notice of the law, were released from paying the duties imposed by that act, by the act which passed the 3d of March, 1821. When the French Government imposed the extra duties above-mentioned, the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815, was known to it, offering a fair, just, and equal commerce to all nations; and her Minister near the Government of the United States was, in 1817, witnessing the liberal disposition of Congress to reduce the duties on French wines, and which was carried into effect by the act of the 3d of March, 1819.

At the time when a spirit friendly to the commerce of France was manifested by this Government, that of France was decreeing extra discriminating duties, which were tantamount to an interdiction of the ports of France to vessels of the United States carrying to them the produce of their country.

* "The discriminating duties paid by vessels of the United States importing the following articles in France, are—1½ cent per pound (French weight) on cotton.

1½ do. do. do. on tobacco.
55 do. per 100 pounds do. on potashes.

"To form an estimate of the practical result of these regulations, it will be assumed that a vessel of 300 registered tons will carry 560,000 pounds weight of tobacco; the difference of duty on which, at 1½ cent per pound, will be $6,300, which is equivalent to $21 per registered ton.

"Or in a vessel of the same description, carrying 280,000 pounds weight of cotton, and 220,000 pounds weight of potashes, the difference of duty, estimated at 1½ cent on the cotton, is $4,200

"And that on the potashes, at 55 cents per 100 pounds, is - - - - - 1,210

"Which is equivalent to $18 per registered ton."

From this statement, it appears that the unjust act of the French Government was passively submitted to for nearly four years, before one countervailing measure was taken. Previously to acting, proposals were made to adjust all differences amicably; but they were evaded. The facts here given will certainly exonerate the American Government from the charge of acting towards France with precipitancy.

4th. Spain.—In the ports of Spain, since the 1st of January, 1821, vessels other than those of Spain, importing certain produce therein, pay one-third more duties than Spanish vessels. Many articles are prohibited, among which are the following: beans, peas, &c., rice, salt beef, and pork, biscuit of all kinds, hams, leather and manufactures of leather, and nails of all kinds.

Foreign vessels are admitted into Spanish ports on the same footing that Spanish vessels are admitted into foreign ports.

5th. With Portugal your committee have no information on which they can rely relating to our commercial intercourse. New regulations have, they believe, been made respecting importations, and some articles of merchandise formerly admitted are now prohibited. The policy of that Government, they persuade themselves, in relation to commerce, will be liberal.

With the Italian States our commercial relations have undergone no change, within the knowledge of the committee.

The statement of exports and their destination, which will form part of this report, will show the value of our exports to those countries, and to the ports on the Adriatic belonging to Austria.

6th. Russia.—It appears by the Russian tariff of 1816 that no duty is paid on cotton imported into Russia in American vessels. About one-third of a cent per pound is paid on rice, and about four cents per pound on tobacco; on cotton yarn and twist, and on woollen yarn and wool, from five to seven and a half per centum ad valorem; on white cotton cloths, woollen cloths, and stuff goods, from fifteen to twenty-five per centum ad valorem; on East and West India products, generally, the duty is probably not so high as upon the same articles when imported into the United States.

7th. Denmark.—The importation duty is half as much more in ships not privileged as it is in privileged ships. Great Britain, Holland, France, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, Hamburg, and Genoa have treaties with Denmark; their vessels enjoy in the ports of Denmark privileges not granted to ours.

* See memorial of the Chamber of Commerce, N. Y.

With China the American trade is inferior to that of no nation, Great Britain excepted; and her best informed men on that subject think the trade of the United States with China is obtaining the advantage. The permission to British merchants to trade with China, and to import into the ports of foreign Europe the productions and manufactures of China, with the exception of teas, is expressive of much solicitude in regard to that trade, especially as doubts may be entertained whether such permission does not come in conflict with the charter of the company trading to China, which will not expire before 1834.

With the dominions of Great Britain in the East Indies, vessels of the United States are permitted to import into and export from them whatever articles of merchandise are not prohibited; and, by the convention with Great Britain already mentioned, the United States are, with respect to this trade, put on the footing of the most favored nation.

The ports of St. Andrew's and St. John's in New Brunswick, the port of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and those in Bermuda, were made free ports, with the view of securing to Great Britain the exclusive trade to her West India islands. This design has been, as will be seen hereafter, defeated by the act of the 15th of May, 1820.

In the ports of the British West India islands vessels of the United States are not admitted.

A document accompanying the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the 9th of February, 1818, states that "very heavy duties have been recently imposed in the British West Indies on American produce, even when carried in British ships." "We should have less reason to complain," it is said in the same document "if the rigor which is shown towards us were dealt out in equal measure to other nations. But this is so far from being the case, that vessels under the flag of any European nation having colonies in the West Indies are admitted, under certain limitations as to size and the nature of their cargoes; the latter of which, however, may be composed of the very articles generally carried from the United States, as well as of indigo, dyewoods, specie, &c. And what must appear very singular in the conduct of a nation affecting extraordinary morality in its public as well as private character, by far the greater part of the commerce carried on under this admission of foreign vessels into her West India islands, is in direct contravention of the laws of the respective Governments to which they belong."

Cuba.—At the port of Havana, tobacco, beef, pork, fish, and butter, are subjected to a duty of about thirty-three per centum on a valuation; lumber and naval stores, from twelve a half to twenty-one and a half per centum ad valorem; flour, to eight dollars and sixty-two and a half cents per barrel. Tonnage duty the same as Spanish vessels pay in the United States.

All articles of American produce are admitted into the ports of Porto Rico on the payment of duties much lower than those paid at the port of Havana.

Guadaloupe.—Live stock, with the exception of horses, free. Salted beef and fish, the average duty of about twenty per centum ad valorem. All other permitted articles, including lumber, naval stores, leaf tobacco, vegetables, leather, fish oil, rice, Indian corn, and Indian meal, pay a duty of three per cent. ad valorem. Tonnage duty and other port charges on the vessel, when loaded with lumber only, fifty-seven cents; but when loaded with other articles, eighty-seven cents.

It is believed that the same articles are admitted, and the same duties are paid in Martinique as at Guadaloupe.

Hayti.—It is also believed that all articles of merchandise, except distilled spirits, are admitted into the ports of Hayti, and that the duties are specifically about equal to fifteen per centum ad valorem. Tonnage duty and other charges on the vessels, from one dollar and fifty cents to two dollars per ton.

St. Thomas.—The tonnage duty and other charges on the vessel do not exceed fifty cents, if that, per ton; and the duty on merchandise imported is very low.

St. Croix.—The duties on the produce of the United States are from five to ten per centum ad valorem, except on articles of luxury, which pay a duty of fifteen per centum ad valorem.

St. Bartholomew's.—The tonnage duty and other charges on the vessel are about twenty cents per ton, and the duty on merchandise imported is very low.

At St. Eustatia and Curacao, all the products of the United States are admitted on moderate terms.

Brazil.—Duties on merchandise pay twenty-four per centum if imported in American vessels, and nineteen per centum when imported in Portuguese vessels. Tonnage duty on American vessels the same as that on Portuguese vessels in the United States.

Your committee now direct your attention to the act of Congress, passed April 18, 1818, prohibiting commercial intercourse between the British West India islands and the United States in British vessels, and to the act supplementary to the above-mentioned act, passed the 15th of May, 1820.

To understand the policy of the United States in relation to this subject, it is necessary to look back, to revive recollections, and to combine many circumstances which seem to have escaped observation with many in forming a decision on a subject of great interest, and not altogether free from intricacy.

When the convention of the 3d of July, 1815, was under consideration, the Government of the United States proposed to the British Cabinet reciprocity of commerce between the United States and Great Britain and her dependencies. The propositions were urged and supported with force and ability. As the British West Indies are dependent on the United States for articles of the first necessity, and as they can get those articles only from them, the expectation that their vessels should participate in carrying to the islands the produce of the United States was reasonable, and in justice ought to have been gratified.

The argument that the expense of protecting and defending the islands should give to the mother country an exclusive commerce with them, would be just and true only when the supplies wanted were drawn from the native resources of the mother country; but to claim the exclusive right to furnish the islands with the produce of other countries, is a claim that reason and conscience at once reject. The Government of the United States is likewise bound to protect and defend the rights of the American people; and that the means of defence intrusted to its management and use for the attainment of that end should not be diminished to increase those of any nation, is an argument still stronger in favor of this Government, because the supplies wanted for the islands are to be obtained from the resources of the United States. The British Cabinet refused to include the West India islands in the convention, and to open their ports to vessels of the United States. The convention was agreed to, and reciprocity of navigation and trade was confined to the commercial intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe.

Each party was left free to do do what might seem best suited to its interest in relation to the British West India trade. The Government of the United States saw at once the policy which influenced the British Cabinet in excluding the West India islands from participating in the reciprocity which the convention established in favor of the British dominions in Europe with the United States. The policy of the British Cabinet was to destroy the equality of navigation which that convention had established between British and American vessels, and thereby to obtain the monopoly in favor of British vessels carrying the produce of the United States to Great Britain and her dependencies, and to other countries. The British Government indulged the hope that the ports of the United States would continue open to her vessels engaged in the West India trade, and that, should the American Government continue them open, British policy would attain the end sought. The chain of British navigation could not be entire until the link connecting the West India trade with the United States in British bottoms should become a part of that chain.

It is estimated that there are employed between Great Britain and her West India colonies about six hundred vessels. They go from the islands with full cargoes to Great Britain; and should the trade between her islands and the United States be kept open, after discharging their cargoes in the ports of Great Britain, they would there take in any part or portion of a cargo for the United States, as the freight would be an object for paying seamen's wages, their subsistence, or other expenses. The smallest sum would be a saving, and benefit the navigation so employed. On arriving in the ports of the United States, full freights for the British islands or other places could be obtained. Now, it must be evident from this view, and the advantages British vessels would have over the American, that the former would be enabled to reduce the freight so low between the United States and Great Britain as to destroy all competition with her vessels. In other words, British vessels having full freights from the United States to British or other islands, and from the islands to Great Britain, the navigating interest of Great Britain would have it in their power to drive from the ocean American vessels.

Should British vessels, after landing a cargo in the islands from the United States, not finding one there for Europe, they could take in one for the United States, or return in ballast to Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans, for a cargo of cotton, rice, or tobacco, for British European ports, or to any into which British vessels are admitted.

Since the aforementioned acts of navigation have been in operation, particularly the supplementary act of the 15th of May, 1820, British vessels, after landing their West India cargoes in British European ports, are obliged to return to the West Indies in ballast. The committee say in ballast, because the quantity of manufactures which are wanting for the British West India islands would not employ the sixtieth part of those vessels.

The freight of the cargo from the West Indies to Great Britain must, under such circumstances, be liable to a considerable deduction for the expense and insurance on the return voyage. Thus, the West India planter, having no choice of markets by the restrictive system, and being compelled to purchase the necessities of life and lumber at the highest prices, and to sell his produce low, is momentarily witnessing the ruin of his fortune.

But it has been said, with a view to render the navigation acts unpopular, that flour and breadstuffs are imported into Great Britain from the United States, and shipped from thence to the West Indies, by which artifice she eludes the effect of the navigation acts.

Without stopping to refute an argument that refutes itself, (for the price of the articles of consumption, being increased by the circuitry and length of the voyage, proves that those acts have the effect intended on British policy,) your committee will take the argument as true; and what will those who advance it gain by it? Vessels of the United States are admitted into British European ports, by the convention already mentioned, on an equality with British vessels. It is known, and the documents accompanying this report will prove the fact, that three-fourths of the tonnage employed between the United States and Great Britain belongs to the United States; the plain inference from this fact is, that American vessels excluded from the carriage of the produce of the United States to the British West India ports will come in for the greatest part of the carrying trade between the United States and Great Britain in the articles in that way destined for the British West India markets. If this be the policy of Great Britain, it injures her islands, and benefits American navigation.

Commercial Intercourse with Foreign Nations.

Thus the argument fails to answer the purpose intended. But the whole of it is fallacious, and nothing more is required to prove it to be so than a statement of facts. The documents annexed prove that, from the 1st of October, 1820, to the 30th of September, 1821, to the European ports of His Britannic Majesty, the following quantities only of flour and biscuit or ship-bread were shipped, viz:

NOTE.—Should there be found any error in the above statement, it can be easily corrected by advertng to document E No. 1.

Your committee will now present this subject in another point of view. British navigation enjoys, in the trade of the West India islands belonging to other Powers, the same advantages that the American does.

Should the navigation acts of 1818 and 1820 be repealed, Great Britain will have, in favor of her navigation between the United States and her islands, the exclusive trade. It has been shown before, that, by such a repeal, British navigation would secure to itself the exclusive trade between the United States and the British dominions in Europe, as well as the additional means it would thereby acquire of supplanting ours in the ports of other European nations, with which it may enjoy privileges not granted to ours. From all these advantages, some of which would be gratuitously conferred on British navigation, your committee will venture to ask, what chance for a fair competition would be left to the American? Much has been said in favor of free trade. The American Government desires nothing so much. By the act of the 3d of March, 1815, a free trade was, and is still, offered by the same act to every nation. In every negotiation on the subject of commerce it has been proposed. Can the Government do more than it has done? Can that be called a free trade when one party is in the full enjoyment of every privilege, and the other is not permitted to move, from restrictions and prohibitions imposed on him? If such can be denominated a free trade, words have lost their common meaning and acceptance.

This sort of free trade would soon prove itself to be an exclusive one in favor of British navigation. It would, in the first place, throw out of employment all the American tonnage, which is not inconsiderable, that is now engaged in the indirect trade; and, secondly, show what an humble pittance would be ours in the direct trade to the West India islands now open to our navigation. From the manner in which a free trade is often spoken of, an inference is drawn that the American Government restricts American navigation. Your committee take this occasion to say that nothing can be more unjust as it regards the American Government. Your committee deny that a solitary law can be found that restricts American navigation in any trade except the slave trade; and they with confidence assert that American vessels are at liberty to proceed with domestic and foreign produce and manufactures to any foreign port whatsoever; and, if American navigation is interdicted an entrance into any foreign port, that that interdiction is the act of a foreign Government, for which the American is in no manner whatsoever obnoxious to censure.

Could the policy which the British Government has been steadily pursuing be matured and carried into operation, from the apathy of nations to their true interests, it would give her the ascendancy over every nation in every market of the world.

The resources of every nation would be converted by that Government into the means of holding it in vassalage. If Great Britain could acquire such advantages in fair competition, the American Government would have no cause to complain; but to suffer her to acquire those advantages by her cupidity, and from her restrictive system on American navigation, would be, on the part of this Government, a dereliction of every principle of sound policy, and a palpable disregard of the interests of the American people. In endeavoring to place the American navigation on the footing of reciprocity, the Government is directed by a policy that is as enlightened as it is magnanimous, and, should it not countervail the restrictive systems of other nations, it would commit the great interests of navigation and commerce to the guardianship and mercy of foreign Governments. It has always been the desire of the American Government to secure to the citizens of the United States an even chance in the race of competition, by giving them a fair start; if they should lose in such a competition, the Government would be elevated above censure. It could, with truth, say to them, you have had secured to you equal ground in the contest; your country, the munificent gift of God, is rich, is abundant in resources; your Government is your own creation; it is considered the best of human institutions; if you do not prosper under the auspices of Heaven and the best of Governments, your failure in success must arise from causes the origin of which it is neither the desire, nor inclination, nor duty of those who administer it to explore.

Many considerations, besides those mentioned, had their weight in determining the Government of the United States to counteract the restrictive system of Great Britain. The ports of the West India islands belonging to other Powers were open to American vessels and produce. To allow British vessels to have free access to the ports of the United States from the British West Indies, when the ports of those islands are interdicted to vessels of the United States, would not only, as has been observed, be an abandonment of the principles of a free and liberal commerce, but a procedure so impolitic as might induce other nations, which now allow American vessels to resort to their ports with American produce, to adopt the exclusive and monopolizing policy of Great Britain.

Every nation is endeavoring to encourage its own navigation and industry, and to bring into operation and use the treasures which the bounty of Providence has bestowed. Were the United States to submit passively to British restrictions, could they complain if other nations having islands in the West Indies should shut their ports against American vessels carrying to them American produce? It is urged by some that, if British vessels were permitted to come to the ports of the United States, a better price could be obtained for American produce. This is but a conjecture, and Government would, in changing or modifying its policy, deserve justly the reprobation of an intelligent people were it to act from mere conjecture. But, admitting that a small advance in the price of a few articles should be the result, would the American people, who cherish the fondest and the purest affection for their country—would this people, the descendants of those who sacrificed every personal and selfish consideration for the independence and good of their common country, for a gain, at most, of a very few hundred thousand dollars, abandon just and fair principles of commerce—principles which other nations, by the invitation of this Government, have adopted, and which are now in successful experiment; injure greatly, if not vitally, American navigation; paralyze the naval arm of defence; subject the nation to the loss of millions of dollars, and, what is worth more than the wealth of worlds, to the loss of national character? These sacrifices, your committee believe, they will never consent to make when they shall fully understand the subject in all its various and important relations; when they shall see that such abandonment of principles is required for the purpose of permitting the British West India islands to be supplied directly with the produce of the United States in British vessels, instead of their being supplied circuitously or indirectly in American vessels. The British islands now procure most of their supplies indirectly from the islands open to American navigation; and it is believed by the most intelligent and experienced merchants in this country that very little more produce would be shipped to the British islands were the American ports open to British vessels. The tonnage of the United States now employed in the West India trade is considerable. From the 1st of October, 1820, to the 30th of September, 1821, the tonnage departing from the ports of the United States to the ports in the West India islands open to our navigation amounted to 329,360 tons, and the tonnage entering the American ports during the same year to 312,809 tons; and the value of the exports to the islands with which American vessels trade, as stated by the Treasury Department, for the year ending on the 30th of September, 1821, amounts to $8,558,357, besides the value of produce shipped to British islands, to the amount of $264,632.

No just estimate can be made, from the value of the produce exported to the West India islands previous to the war declared by the United States against Great Britain, and during the war in Europe, because the naval and military forces which the belligerents were compelled to have in those seas, and to garrison the forts in their respective possessions, required an unusual quantity of the produce of the United States for their use and consumption; and as little reliance can be placed on an estimate made on the produce exported to those islands in 1817 and 1818, because those years were years of great scarcity. In 1817, the average price of flour for that year exceeded eleven dollars per barrel in the United States; and for the year 1818, the average of the same article exceeded nine dollars per barrel, also in the United States. Other articles rose likewise in value.

These are facts, and with dispassionate and reflecting men will have the influence they deserve.

The trade with the British islands has been magnified much beyond its intrinsic value. In the year 1816, British navigation had, between the British islands and the United States, the possession of that trade. In that year the importations into the United States were:

NOTE.—See document D No. 1.

These facts speak a plain and intelligible language; they have neither art nor deception in them. It should neither escape the recollection of men in search of truth, that, besides the markets of the West India islands, which are open to American commerce, those of the continent of America south of the United States are likewise open, and will continue to be so, to American enterprise; that some parts of the United States already supply our markets with sugar, molasses, and rum. The average annual quantity of sugar made in Louisiana is estimated at twenty millions of pounds. In a few years more, the sugar made in the United States will be nearly equal, if not quite, to the home consumption. It should also be borne in mind (and the facts above stated prove the position taken) that we are daily becoming more independent of the British West Indies, and likewise of the islands belonging to other Powers, while all those islands will remain dependent on the United States for supplies of the first necessity. (See document.)

American statesmen should recollect that, by a late treaty with Spain, East and part of West Florida now form no inconsiderable portion of the territories of the United States, and that they contain millions of acres of fine lands adapted to the growth of sugar cane; but, what is of the greatest political importance, those territories have large and commodious ports for the American navy, that they abound in the finest ship timber, and that, from their geographical position, they give the United States the liberty and opportunity of looking into the West India ports, and of seeing the trade of the most productive and valuable islands in those seas pass by their shores.

The effects of permitting British vessels to enter the ports of the United States, when the ports of the British West Indies are shut against the entrance of American vessels, have been, in general terms, mentioned. Your committee will now, in a more specific manner, show the magnitude of the interests that will be injured, and vitally, too, by a repeal of the navigation acts. This they cannot do in a better way than by making a plain statement of the interests that will be affected, accompanied with such remarks as naturally arise from the subjects under consideration. The tonnage of the United States, including that employed in the foreign and coasting trade and the fisheries, cannot at this time be valued at less than $40,000,000. But who will venture to estimate its political, its national value? "The American tonnage employed," says Dr. Seybert, "in the foreign trade from 1795 to 1801, both years inclusive, amounted, in the aggregate, to 4,544,314 tons, or 649,187 tons per annum; the profits on it, if calculated at the rate of $50 per ton for the average annual value of freight out and home, on voyages of every description, must have produced for freight alone $32,459,350 per annum." In a note on this passage, it is said that the above estimate for the gain for freight is a moderate allowance; intelligent merchants have calculated is as high as $70 per ton on voyages of every description. From the 1st of October, 1820, to the 30th of September, 1821, 765,098 tons of American vessels, employed in the foreign trade, entered the ports of the United States; and 804,947 tons, engaged in the foreign trade, departed therefrom. Your committee are desirous, in all their estimates, to keep moderation in view; as such, they prefer making their estimates lower than either facts or circumstances justify. They cannot persuade themselves that the present annual gain for freight can be fairly estimated at much less than $20,000. No estimate is made for the freight carried by 661,118 tons of vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries.

This interest, this national interest, your committee humbly represent, is too great to be endangered for a good barely in contemplation; and were it a real one, its acquisition would be too dearly purchased by the sacrifice of so great a national interest.

American navigation is the nursery of American seamen, and the true interest of this nation requires that it should be encouraged and protected. Should it be greatly injured by the adoption of any impolitic measure, our Navy would be vanquished, not by British prowess, but by British policy. Our seamen, the artificers of commercial wealth in peace, and in war the intrepid defenders of their country's honor and rights, would be driven to seek employment and subsistence from the enemies of their country. Our shipwrights, and all artists connected with the art and mystery of shipbuilding and navigation, would be by necessity compelled to migrate to distant lands, and earn in some other vocation their pittance of bread.

The Atlantic States would, in having their security and enterprise diminished and circumscribed, lose their population, and the entrance into and the departure from every river and bay in the United States, from the Passamaquoddy to the Sabine, might be interdicted to American vessels by a few ships of war belonging to any Power hostile to the United States. The expenditures for the service of the militia during the last war were immense, and the duties imposed during that war on the citizens of the United States oppressive and burdensome. Had the United States at that time strong fortifications at proper points, and an efficient Navy, a few British ships of war, with a small floating military force, would never have ventured into the waters of the United States; nor would the Government have been under the necessity of incurring enormous expenditures, and subjecting the citizens to severe and countless privations.

Such considerations as these impress your committee with a conviction that they should not rashly condemn a policy which was adopted after much deliberation, with a unanimity uncommon in matters of such importance and interest, which has been persevered in with the same spirit in which it originated, and which is at this time, after full experience to test its wisdom, generally approved.

The United States possess from the bounty of Providence the greatest advantages. No nation has within itself more ample means of self-subsistence. Variety of climates and soils favorable to agriculture in its greatest extent, raw materials without stint for manufactures, and numerous navigable rivers for transportation, are theirs. Abounding in productions of every sort, they have all the means that can be desired for extensive commerce. And it becomes with them an important consideration to secure to their produce and manufactures, under all circumstances, a safe and ready transportation in their own vessels to markets at which they shall be in demand. If we give up the transportation of them to other nations, the consequence will be a depression of their price; because any nation that has a superior navy, when the nations of Europe shall be at war, will have in one or another mode the monopoly of our produce, and the means of depriving our manufactures of a foreign market. The nation that can, by its naval power, command our market, will prevent competition, buy cheap, and sell even to its enemy, at high prices, our produce, as Great Britain did during the last European war to France. In a former part of this report the captures of American vessels with their cargoes as stated, and the transit duties we were compelled to pay Great Britain for a license to trade with other foreign nations, must be recollected with indignant feelings by every man who honors and loves his country.

To possess the means of transportation is to us an invaluable right. To enjoy it, it is only necessary to rely on the resources which Providence has bestowed. A nation may be strong on land and feeble on the ocean; and another may be the reverse, comparatively feeble on the land and powerful on the ocean. Great Britain, compared with France, affords an apposite instance; her wealth, the product of manufactures and commerce, and her naval preponderance, gave her the ascendancy in her late contest with France, enabling her to overthrow a colossal Power that at one time dictated law to continental Europe. These are historical facts, and mentioned for no invidious purpose, but to show that our physical and moral force, how great soever it may be, if confined to land, will not give those advantages that are essential to agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial prosperity.

A navy, efficient, but not large, would secure every benefit that we could desire.

Whosoever the nations of Europe shall engage in war, the consciousness that our power thrown into the scale of either party would give to that scale into which it should be thrown the preponderance, will be sensibly felt in the comity observed towards us, and in the security with which our commerce would move. Our produce and manufactures would always have a ready and safe transportation. Our vessels would go, in peace or in war, uninterrupted everywhere, be welcomed into every port, and, having the markets of the civilized world opened to their access, would bring our produce and manufactures into demand, raise their price, and (what is no little advantage) insure, as far as that is attainable, steadiness in the markets.

These remarks are made, not only because your committee deem them worthy of consideration, but with a view of drawing public attention to the able report made to Congress in the year 1791, under the presidency of Washington, by Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State, on the subject of navigation and commerce. The views then taken are so just and applicable to the present state of things, that your committee beg leave to cite so much as has a bearing on the subject now under consideration, and to make the same a part of this report.

"Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in exchange either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market—customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.

"But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter-prohibitions, duties, and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.

"Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry, it is valuable; but as a resource of defence, essential.

"Its value as a branch of industry is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace, it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

"But it is as a resource of defence that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their landboard, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights; but, on their seaboard, they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen, and of artists and establishments in readiness for shipbuilding.

"Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves exclusively any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation of the benefits of the seafaring business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their object. But, if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and, more especially, if they seize on the means of the United States to convert them into aliment for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded, or it will be disarmed of its defence; its productions will be at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed at the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defence, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring home to our feelings the error of having abandoned them. The materials for maintaining our due share of navigation are ours in abundance; and as to the mode of using them, we have only to adopt the principles of those who thus put us on the defensive, or others equivalent and better fitted to our circumstances."

The memorials and resolutions which have been referred to the committee have received the consideration due to them. They find that the prominent objections contained in them to the act of the 18th of April, 1818, and the supplementary act of the 15th of May, 1820, are as follows:

1st. That the operation of those acts injures materially the agriculture of the Southern States.

2d. That the policy pursued by the Government of the United States will occasion the loss to them of the British West India market, by compelling the British Government to procure supplies for the islands in other countries.

3d. That the system of countervailing British restrictions has been tried, and found inefficient.

In answering the first objection, your committee state that nearly, if not four-fifths of the produce exported to the West India islands other than those belonging to Great Britain, from the 1st October, 1820, to the 30th September, 1821, according to the statement made in page 2247, appears to be the produce of the Southern States; and if the general views taken by your committee be just, no States in this Union are more interested in the encouragement of American navigation, or require more an efficient navy to protect their exposed maritime frontier, than the Southern States. Your committee further state that every attention to defend the maritime frontier, by the erection of competent fortifications, has been bestowed, and that large contracts for timber for naval purposes, and expenditures of money, have been made for navy yards, and for building ships of war there. In short, in every instance has the Government of the United States shown its solicitude and care for their permanent welfare and prosperity.

Your committee are of opinion that they cannot give to all the objections above mentioned an answer more satisfactory than is contained in the petition of the Council and Assembly of Granada, unanimously adopted in July, 1821, to the British House of Commons; the representations and reasons therein set forth and urged by the petitioners being in perfect accordance with those made and urged by Jamaica and other islands on the subject of their grievances.

As those islanders may be presumed to understand their own interest, and to know best their wants, and the countries on which they are dependant for their supplies, your committee think they cannot render any service to their country more acceptable or better adapted to the diffusion of correct information, than to give the views which those islanders have drawn of their situation. Their sufferings and feelings, expressed in their own style and manner, afford the best evidence that can be offered that the aforementioned navigation acts are producing the effects intended, and that our countervailing policy is in direct opposition to the predictions uttered, rendering the British West India islands worse than useless to Great Britain.

"The petition of the Legislative Council and General Assembly of Granada and its dependencies humbly sheweth:

"That, from causes which we respectfully beg leave to lay before Parliament, the island of Granada, in common with the other West India colonies, is now reduced to a state of the greatest distress. With all deference, we submit our case to the consideration of the honorable House of Commons, trusting that, in its solicitude for the general welfare, it will not be insensible to the hardships we lie under, and to the difficulties with which we have to contend; and we firmly rely on its wisdom and justice to afford us the relief that is absolutely necessary to save us from impending ruin.

"The sources of our present distress may be classed under two heads. The first is the almost total interruption of our commerce with the United States of America, by which we are prevented from receiving, at moderate prices, the productions of the States, and are deprived of an extensive market for our rum and molasses, which are readily received in barter for the supplies with which they furnished us. The second source is the depressed state of those markets for our staple commodities to which we are allowed access. It is a fact which we believe no attempt will now be made to controvert, that the sugar colonies are dependant on the United States of America for a great part of the supplies they require of dry provisions, staves, and lumber of all sorts; and that although part of these may be furnished by our own northern States, yet of some kinds they are altogether destitute, and such as they do produce cannot be purchased from them on such favorable terms as from the inhabitants of the American States in barter. In the years 1810, 1811, and 1812, when American vessels were admitted into our ports, lumber and staves of all kinds were to be purchased at a price little exceeding one-half of that which we at present pay, whilst for our rum, which we deliver in barter, we received about one-fourth more than we do now. On the restoration of peace with the United States we were tolerably well supplied, as long as British vessels from these islands were admitted into our ports; and we did not experience any great difficulty even after the passing of the non-intercourse act, so long as our rum was received in barter, but were supplied through our own free ports, though at advanced prices, until the passing of the supplementary act, on the 20th May, 1820, which prohibits the importation into the United States from the British provinces and free ports of all articles the produce of the British West India islands; the consequence of which is, that the barter trade is now completely at an end. All purchases of American articles, whether made in our northern provinces or in Bermuda, must be made with money or bills of exchange, which again must be provided for by remittances to England. We do further beg leave respectfully to represent, that the British North American provinces afford no market for our rum further than their own consumption; and that the whole of this, including Newfoundland and the fisheries, has been correctly ascertained to be under twenty-five thousand puncheons per annum—about the produce of two of the small islands. It is, therefore, evident that, were these provinces even capable of supplying our wants, we could not purchase from them, from their inability to take off our produce in payment. But the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick produce no pitch pine, very little red oak, and scarcely any white oak timber; and they at times are dependant on Canada and the States for flour and other dry provisions for their support. The Canadas, it is true, produce considerable quantities of timber suitable to our purposes, but the labor of preparing and bringing them to market is very great, which, with the length and difficulty of navigation, and consequent additional freight and other charges, enhances the cost to nearly double of that which is now imported in the United States by free ports. And it is also to be taken into account that the navigation of the St. Lawrence is shut up for nearly half a year. With all deference and humility we beg leave to represent that, as a constituent part of the empire, we are entitled to an equal share of the protection and fostering care of a parent State; and, also, that we ought to be allowed the means of supplying our wants on the best and cheapest terms, and in those markets where our produce is readily taken in exchange. We have no wish whatever to attempt to magnify the importance and value of the sugar colonies to the mother country, at the expense of other possessions; but, under existing circumstances, we trust we shall be excused for requesting the attention of Parliament to the relative value of these colonies and the North American provinces, as appears by the annexed document, made out from the most authentic sources.

"In order, therefore, to grant the necessary relief, and to remove our present distress and difficulties, we do humbly suggest that the ports of these islands should be generally thrown open for the admission of American vessels. In doing so, as matters are at present situated, little injury would be done to the trade and shipping of the United Kingdom. In the present restricted state of the American commerce, the greater part of our supplies is conveyed a part of the voyage by their own vessels. It could, therefore, make very little difference to allow the Americans to come to our ports at once; and this would be more than compensated by our shipping being then permitted to trade direct to the States. We may add, that the trade betwixt these islands and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in native vessels, is now nearly at an end; few of them come here, and we can place no dependance on a regular supply. This arises from their market being already overstocked with the produce they receive in exchange."

Your committee feel themselves under the necessity of making a few remarks before they close this part of their report. They are urged to submit them in consequence of errors evident in some of the memorials referred to them.

The act concerning navigation, which passed the 18th of April, 1818, and the supplementary act of May 15, 1820, have been assimilated to the embargo and non-intercourse laws, and all those acts, taken together, considered as forming but one system, having at different times the same object in view. This is evidently a misconception of the nature and design of acts which did not originate in the same causes, and which are deducible from times and circumstances that have no relation whatsoever. Let facts speak for themselves. On the 8th of December, 1807, the following message was sent to Congress by Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States:

"The communication now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas and elsewhere, from the belligerent Powers of Europe, and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantages which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States."

The Government of the United States desired nothing so much as to secure our seamen from impressment, and our commerce from violation; and it was always ready, on the revocation of the edicts of the belligerents, to repeal the embargo and non-intercourse laws. The fourth section of the act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes, passed May 1, 1810, enacts that, in case either Great Britain or France shall, before the 3d of March next, so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President shall declare by proclamation, &c., and when the fact shall be so announced, the commercial intercourse shall be renewed with the nation which shall have ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. "The French Government declaring, on the 5th of August, 1810, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked, and that after the 1st of November, 1810, they would cease to have effect," upon this assurance the President of the United States, on the 2d of November, 1810, issued a proclamation, announcing the fact, thereby giving effect to the provision of the fourth section of the said act. From this statement, it is evident the embargo and non-intercourse acts had objects in view different from those which the acts of the 18th of April, 1818, and the 15th of May, 1820, are designed to obtain. When the embargo and non-intercourse laws were in operation, the ports of the West India islands were open to us, but our vessels, in going to or coming from them, were subjected to violence and outrage by the ships of war and privateers of the belligerent Powers. It has been also urged, as an argument against the acts of the 18th day of April, 1818, and the 15th of May, 1820, that the countervailing policy which they establish has been tried, and found unavailing.

This argument is more specious than solid. The premises from which it is drawn have been assumed. It is in direct opposition to the fact.

Your committee state, with confidence, that the last-mentioned acts are the only acts that have ever formed a systematic plan for countervailing the restrictive system of Great Britain in relation to her West India islands.

Your committee have, in many instances, been reluctantly compelled to notice the policy of Great Britain to this country, and particularly that which she has observed in regulating the trade of her colonies.

While they cannot refrain from expressing feelings of sincere respect for the virtues of a Wilberforce, and those worthies who have, in the spirit of enlightened humanity, co-operated with him to abolish the slave trade, they regret that they cannot bestow on the British Government praise for disinterested exertions in endeavoring to destroy a traffic that is as barbarous as it is disgraceful.

Commercial Intercourse with Foreign Nations.

They see in its efforts a cold calculating policy, to acquire for the British colonies advantages over the colonies and possessions of other Powers in those regions. It considers their improvements in cultivation as incompatible with the prosperity of its own.

The committee forbear to enlarge on this subject, as it is one that cannot produce other than painful feelings and reflections. They present to the House, with these observations, a part of the petition of the Council and Assembly of Granada to the British Parliament, touching this subject. The part here given speaks for itself; it is the key that unlocks the British Cabinet, and exposes to broad daylight the secret workings and machinations of its policy.

"The next cause of the depression of the price of colonial produce is, our being almost entirely excluded from the market of the continent of Europe. A perseverance in the present numerous and burdensome restrictions on the trade with foreign Powers is severely felt by the West India planters as well as by the British manufacturer. But the chief cause of this exclusion from the markets on the continent of Europe is the immense quantity of foreign sugars with which it is now supplied, arising from the enlarged cultivation of the foreign colonies, and which they are enabled to increase to an unlimited extent, by the continuance of the slave trade. This traffic, which is so much condemned and justly reprobated by the British Parliament and the public, is at present carried on, there is reason to think, to a greater extent than in any former period. At the time the abolition laws were passed, it was contemplated that Government would have sufficient influence with foreign Powers to induce them to adopt a similar measure. In this we have most lamentably been disappointed; and whilst, from our diminished slave population, our productions are on the decline, we have the mortification to see those of the foreign colonies regularly increasing.

"A due consideration of all these circumstances, we conceive, will be found to furnish us with an additional claim upon Parliament and the mother country. We humbly represent that, in the present situation of the colonies, no impediment should be thrown in the way of providing for the health, comfort, and well-being of our slaves, and of carrying on the cultivation of our plantations at the least expense and to the best advantage. The present restriction in our commerce with the United States completely operates as such; and as we now have but little prospect of a foreign market, we earnestly hope that every measure that may tend to a more general consumption of our produce at home, or otherwise to relieve the planter, will be adopted."

Your committee now proceed to present a statement of the commerce of the United States, from the 1st of October, 1820, to the 30th of September, 1821. To understand clearly the commerce of that year, a few introductory remarks are made previously necessary. They are induced to make them with an intention of preventing erroneous impressions. Statements of facts should be made with caution, and, when made, a reference should always be had to the time and circumstances which gave them existence. By acting in this manner every thing is seen, as well as human reason will permit it, in its proper light—in its various bearings on, and comparisons with other things. The reverse of this procedure leads to inferences as erroneous and unjust as they will be mischievous in their consequences. Party views may be promoted by it, and hostility to particular measures and men be gratified; but the peace and harmony of this nation will be destroyed, and its best interests will suffer severely. Every attempt, if we may be allowed the expression, to fix the latitude and longitude of distinct feelings and interests, weakens the bonds that unite us as one people, and defers, if it shall not destroy, the prosperity we desire. It produces feuds and divisions which the arts and intrigues of foreign Governments, by their agents, never fail to foment, to promote their views. Your committee can see no cause for the indulgence of apprehensions arising from a supposititious difference of interest and views. The danger of indulging them is forcibly represented by General WASHINGTON in his last Farewell Address; and your committee cannot render a more important service to those who indulge such apprehensions than to recommend a serious perusal of it, to remove them effectually.

Your committee now aver, and this averment is not lightly nor rashly, but coolly and deliberately made, that the success of foreign policy, manifestly hostile to the just rights and expectations of the United States, has been grounded on a supposed difference of interests existing between the Northern and Southern States, and on the collisions which such a supposed difference would produce in our political family and domestic concerns.

On the peace in Europe, and particularly on the conclusion of peace between the United States and Great Britain, it was supposed that the demand in Europe and the United States for produce and manufactures would be so great as to justify importations and exportations without any regard to quantity, and, in some instances, even as to value. The importations of foreign manufactures into the United States were uncommonly large, perhaps double or treble what they had ever been before, for the same time. These increased the revenue arising from duties on merchandise imported for the years 1815 and 1816 to $27,000,000 and to $36,000,000. Tobacco and cotton at that period bore high prices, particularly tobacco. Those importations and exportations, being greatly over the demand, necessarily ruined many, and diminished considerably the importations of subsequent years, and also the revenue arising from the duties.

Flour, in consequence of the foreign demand, bore a high price in the years 1816, 1817, and 1818; for the year 1820, and half of the year 1821, the price was much lower than usual, owing to the want of a demand for it in Europe. The shipments of flour for the West India islands open to American navigation, as has been shown in a former part of this report, were great, amounting in the year 1821 to 540,775 barrels.

We are now brought to the time when, from its distance from the general peace of Europe, it may be reasonably supposed that things have nearly accommodated themselves or settled down to the relations of peace. In comparing the commerce of the United States for the year 1821 (we mean the fiscal year) with that of preceding years, the facts above stated should be weighed with deliberation; and in connexion with this additional and important one, that the severest depression which commerce has experienced since the general peace in Europe was experienced in the first and second quarters of the year 1821. At the last-mentioned time it seems to have reached its lowest point of depression. We trust we have now passed the crisis of our greatest sufferings, and that our prospects as to the future are flattering. The indications that commerce is reviving are, an increase of the revenue arising from the customs; the full proportion, as will soon appear, which our navigation obtains of employment; the value of the produce and manufactures exported exceeding that of the merchandise imported—a circumstance which has not before occurred since the late peace with Great Britain; and the great satisfaction which five-sixths of the merchants express as to the policy which the Government has adopted in relation to commercial affairs. All they ask of the Government at present is, to let things remain as they are, confidently relying that time and enterprise, directed by prudence and judgment, will accomplish the object every patriot has in view—the prosperity of our common country.

Your committee will now submit a statement of facts, with such explanatory remarks as may be necessary.

First, as to the tonnage of the United States paying duties.

The committee are not a little gratified, on examination, to find that the tonnage of the United States which paid duties for the year 1820 exceeds that of any year since the adoption of the Constitution; this fact will, we trust, remove every cause for distrusting the statements of tonnage made under the direction and superintendence of the Treasury Department, because the tonnage paying duties, as in existence, is something tangible.

It shows that the tonnage is employed; for if it were not, the duties could not be collected from it; and the following facts show not only that it is employed, but that it is getting the advantage, under existing circumstances, in its competition with the foreign tonnage.

Statistical view of the commerce of the United States, exhibiting the value of imports and exports; also the tonnage of American and foreign vessels arriving into and departing from the United States, and the tonnage belonging to each foreign Power employed in the commerce of the United States for the year ending 30th September, 1821.

Secondly, the district or actual tonnage.

The statement A, No. 3, gives the actual tonnage of registered, enrolled, and licensed vessels, and of fishing vessels. In the statement referred to, the Register of the Treasury, in a note on the registered tonnage for the year 1818, says: "The decrease of tonnage in this year arises principally from the registered tonnage having been corrected in 1818, by striking off all the vessels the registers of which were granted prior to the year 1815, and which were supposed by the collectors to have been lost at sea, captured, &c." Had the tonnage been corrected in the year 1816, the registered tonnage of that and the following year (1817) would have been reduced in the same proportion.

The reason the tonnage paying duties is greater in the amount than the actual tonnage, is this: vessels engaged in the foreign trade pay duties for every voyage they perform, and sometimes the same vessel performs from two to three voyages. Vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries pay duties but once a year. More new vessels were built in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, and more in 1815 than in any preceding year. The cause of this is evident. Many vessels had been captured during the war with Great Britain. After the peace, our shipping was not equal to the demand for the foreign and coasting trade and the fisheries; and the same cause continued, with weakened force, to operate on the years 1818 and 1819. The tonnage being now competent to our proportion of navigation, the demand for so great a quantity of new tonnage will not exist. Shipbuilding is a manufacture of no inconsiderable extent, and the foreign demand for vessels, together with the home, will always give it due encouragement.

From the facts stated, we are much gratified to find that the only period of time which has occurred since the adoption of the Constitution, of testing, during a state of general peace, our commercial enterprise with that of foreign nations, has proved our ability to sustain that competition. The documents annexed will, we think, support us in entertaining that belief. So far are we, after taking every view suggested by reason or fancy of the subjects to which our attention has been called, from seeing any benefit that could possibly accrue to the United States by a change of their policy, that we are more than ever impressed with the deepest conviction that such a change would be productive of the greatest injury to our navigation and commerce, and would ultimately impair to that degree our means for naval defence as to make the policy of keeping up the Naval Establishments a question deserving the serious investigation of the National Legislature. We have the strongest reasons to believe (and this belief is founded on information drawn from pure sources) that the British West India islands cannot be made profitable to the mother country but from supplies which the United States are alone competent to furnish.

The productions of the British West India islands, we know to a certainty, cannot now stand any competition in foreign markets with the same productions from Brazil, the East Indies, and the West India islands belonging to other Powers.

We are fully apprized that our countervailing policy is operating its effect. The British islands are now suffering the greatest privations, and some of them are losing their population.

We regret with sincerity their sufferings. The policy of the United States in relation to them was adopted with reluctance, and not till Great Britain had refused to permit the United States to participate in a just and fair trade with her islands. So conscious was the Legislature of Granada of the reluctance on the part of the American Government to resort to that measure, that it did not, in the petition aforementioned, express the slightest censure as to the course taken by the American Government.

We are of opinion, after contemplating, after viewing Great Britain in every relation in which she has stood to the American people, that she is the last nation that ought to expect they would knowingly sacrifice their navigation and commerce, and their maritime rights, to support the maritime rights of Great Britain; and your committee will be among the last to recommend such a sacrifice to gratify the inordinate, the overweening ambition of any nation.

Convinced that the true interest of the United States, and that the great principles which the Government has always advocated in favor of free commerce, forbid a change of policy; acting as the committee do from such convictions, and from a sense of public duty, they feel themselves bound respectfully and unanimously to recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolutions.

Resolved, That the act concerning navigation, passed the 18th of April, 1818, and the act supplementary to the act concerning navigation, passed the 15th of May, 1820, made necessary to countervail the restrictive systems of Great Britain and France, and for the protection of the navigation and commerce of the United States from injuries, are still, and, as long as those adversary systems shall continue, must be necessary to protect from injuries the same great interest, and ought not to be repealed.

Resolved, That the Government of the United States, having uniformly declared and avowed its attachment to the principles of free commerce, and having, in the treaties which it has formed and agreed to with foreign nations, and in its legislative acts adhered to them, should be the last to abandon them, and especially at a time when every just and enlightened nation is conforming its commercial policy to an accordance with those principles.

Brevet Rank in the Army.

B R E V E T R A N K .

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, March 7, 1822, by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.]

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Jan. 21, 1822.

SIR: Brevet Major Generals Scott and Gaines having presented their claims for brevet pay and emoluments, "as being on duty, and having commands according to their brevet rank," the case was submitted, by the direction of the President, for the decision of the Attorney General, a copy of whose official opinion I herewith transmit. His decision being favorable to the claim, under the existing laws and organization of the army, growing out of the late reduction, I have deemed it my duty to apprise the committee of the fact.

I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

HON. WILLIAM EUSTIS,

Chairman Military Committee.

OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GEN. U. S.,

December 29, 1821.

SIR: I proceed, according to your request, to give you my opinion on the laws touching brevet pay, as they apply to the cases of Generals Scott and Gaines.

The act of Congress of the 6th July, 1812, "making further provision for the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," authorizes the President to confer brevet pay, in certain cases, "provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to entitle officers, so brevetted, to any additional pay or emoluments, except when commanding separate posts, districts, or detachments, when they shall be entitled to, and receive, the same pay and emoluments to which officers of the same grades are now, or hereafter may be, allowed by law."

This act was passed flagrante bello, and was manifestly intended as a stimulus to enterprise in a struggle which it was foreseen would require all our strength. It received a liberal construction during the war, as it was proper it should do.

On the return of peace, the act of the third of March, 1815, "fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," was passed. It provided, among other things, that there should be two Major Generals and four Brigadiers; and, on the subject of pay, it expressly provides "that the compensation, subsistence, and clothing of the officers, &c., composing the Military Peace Establishment, shall be the same as are prescribed by the act entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States,' passed 16th of March, 1802, and the act entitled 'An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force,' passed 12th of April 1802; and that the Major Generals shall be entitled to the same compensation as is provided by an act entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force, passed 11th of January, 1812.'"

such thing as brevet rank, or brevet compensation. The act of 6th July, 1812, which alone recognised them, is not among the acts referred to as giving the rule of compensation. It is true it is not expressly repealed; but as to the matter of compensation, it was virtually repealed; it was at least rendered inoperative by its exclusion from the list of acts referred to as fixing the scale of compensation; for, in a case like this, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

Such, however, was not the construction given to the act of the 3d March, 1815. The act of 6th July, 1812, was acted upon precisely in the same manner as if it had been among the acts referred to, as prescribing the compensation; separate posts and districts were created and multiplied, as if to open a wider theatre for its more extensive operation; and there were few, if any, brevets in the army which did not draw brevet pay. The practical effects of this construction may be illustrated by the single case of the generals. The law clearly contemplated that two officers only should receive the pay of Major General; it expressly separates them from the other officers by referring specifically to the act of 11th January, 1812, as fixing their compensation; but, by engrafting the brevet law of the 6th July, 1812, on the act of 3d March, 1815, the distinction between the brigadier and major generals was broken up; and we had six major generals in pay, instead of two, as the law, it seems to me, clearly contemplated. The construction, I think, was erroneous, but it was an error in favor of those who have deserved most highly of their country, in her hour of greatest peril and necessity.

The brevet law of the 6th July, 1812, being thus continued in practical operation after the return of peace, exactly as it had been during the war, the act of 16th of April, 1818, "regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers," was passed; by which it was enacted "that the officers of the army, who have brevet commissions, shall be entitled to, and receive, the pay and emoluments of their brevet rank when on duty, and having a command according to their brevet rank, and at no other time."

This law raises the question, what is a command according to brevet rank? Generals Gaines and Scott insist that the question can be answered only by a reference to the act of the 6th July, 1812, which alone designates what shall be considered as a brevet command, and declares it to consist in the command of a separate post, district, or detachment. But this was the construction already in practice, and, thus construed, the law was unnecessary. It is very manifest that the law was intended to alter something in the practice of the pay department, which Congress disapproved; but the construction for which these gentlemen contend would confirm the practice, and not alter it. It is true that, if we put aside the practice, and look at the laws by themselves, the construction for which these gentlemen contend has great force; for if the act of 1818 had been passed with reference only to the act of 1815, then, as the effect of the act of 1815 was, according to my construction, to destroy brevet rank and pay under the Peace Establishment, the act of 1818 must have been considered as designed to recognise and restore them, giving the pay whenever the rank existed, and referring for its exposition to the act of 1812, which was the sole creating and directing act upon the subject. Such, I acknowledge, was my own opinion while I considered, as from my situation I necessarily must, the laws as standing alone, and the act of 1818 as growing entirely and solely out of the act of 1815. Understanding, however, from your Department, that the practice was already precisely that which this construction would deduce from the act of 1818, it becomes manifest that this latter act could not have grown out of the act of 1815, but out of the erroneous practice under that act which it was intended to correct and reform; and the act of 1818, thus construed with reference to the evil which it was intended to remedy, has, I think, been correctly expounded by the order of the 8th May, 1818, page 125 of the printed rules and regulations of the War Department, of the edition of 1820, to wit: "Brevet officers shall receive the pay and emoluments of their brevet commissions when they exercise command equal to their brevet rank; for example, a brevet captain must command a company; a brevet major and a brevet lieutenant colonel, a battalion; a brevet colonel, a regiment; a brevet brigadier general, a brigade; a brevet major general, a division." Brevet Major Generals Gaines and Scott did not, I understand, command divisions, and therefore, according to this opinion, were not entitled to the brevet pay of a major general under the act of 1818.

These gentlemen further insist that if the act of the 6th July 1812, is not to give the rule as to brevet rank and pay, and if we are to resort to the numerical force under the command of an officer to give his rank, still, by this criterion also, they were entitled to the rank, and, consequently, to the pay of their brevets, under the act of 1818; because, although their actual command was not equal to a full division, it was more than a brigade; that, in passing the limits of a brigade, it transcended their commission as brigadier generals, and called for a higher rank in the commander, which call could be satisfied only by their brevets of major general. This position considered with critical and technical rigor, is, perhaps, correct; but, in construing an act of Congress, we are to look to the intention of the law-makers; and there is nothing in the policy or language of the act to induce the belief that Congress were looking to any minute subdivision of the cases before them. The mischief intended to be remedied was the prodigal waste of the public money in the profuse allowance of brevet pay. The remedy to be applied was to restrict this allowance, 1st. To such officers as were actually on duty; 2d. To such whose commands accorded with their brevet rank. If these latter words are susceptible of two constructions, that construction must be preferred which will best advance the remedy and repress the mischief; and if the construction which is to produce this effect be, moreover, the most obvious sense of the term, on every principle of statutory construction it must be preferred.

Now, I apprehend, if any one at all acquainted with the organization of an army were asked "what is the command of a brigadier?" The obvious answer would be "a brigade;" and so, if asked "what is the command of a major general?" The obvious answer would be "a division." And this, I apprehend, was the meaning of Congress in the words "having a command according to their brevet rank." Hence, in this view of the subject also, I apprehend that the order of the War Department of the 8th of May, 1818, before quoted, has correctly expounded the meaning of this act.

We come now to the act of the 2d March, 1821, "to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States." This act provides that the Peace Establishment shall be composed of four regiments of artillery, and seven regiments of infantry, with such officers of engineers, of ordnance, and of the staff, as are thereafter provided for. The act declares what officers belong to the Peace Establishment, and, among others, that there shall be one major general and two brigadier generals; and on the subject of pay, it is declared that the officers, &c., shall have the same rank, pay, and emoluments, as are provided in like cases by existing laws.

The President is required to arrange the officers and troops retained in the Peace Establishment, and he has made such an arrangement as has placed Generals Gaines and Scott at the head of more than four regiments each. By the same act Congress has adopted the System of General Regulations for the Army, compiled by Major General Scott; and by the 44th article, 2d paragraph (page 85) of these regulations, it is stated that two regiments shall constitute a brigade, and two brigades a division; so that, according to this arrangement, each of these gentlemen is now at the head of a corps exceeding the amount of a division. It is true that this section of the regulations is headed "Economy of an Army in Campaign," and the particular article under consideration contemplates the organization of troops in brigades, divisions, and army corps, on their arrival at the place appointed for rendezvous. Hence it may be said that this article furnishes no criterion of what constitutes a division in quarters. But I understand that, in this organization of troops into brigades and divisions, General Scott has proposed nothing new, but has merely proposed to give an authentic form to the pre-existing and well known distribution. That companies, regiments, brigades, and divisions, constitute an arrangement known in time of peace as well as in war, is manifest from the order of the Department of War of the 8th of May, 1818, founded on the act of the 16th of April, of the same year; and the act itself, which was passed in time of peace, must be considered as recognising the same arrangement, because it has been already shown that such is the only rational construction of the terms "having a command according to their brevet rank."

With such authority before us, it will not do to affirm that a "division" is a term of distribution known only in war, and wholly unknown in peace. I consider it as having been clearly within the contemplation of Congress when they passed the act of the 16th of April, 1818, and the order of the 8th of May, as being only a more distinct declaration of the same fact. I understand, too, from the military officers in the department, that four regiments were clearly and always considered as composing a division, before the adoption of General Scott's regulations, and consequently independent of their authority. This, however, is a question which you are much better qualified to decide than myself.

Assuming it for the present that each of these gentlemen is now at the head of a division, the question is, whether they are entitled to the pay of their brevet rank since they were placed in this situation. The question is extremely difficult. Looking at the act in a general view, it would seem to have been clearly the intention of Congress that the Government should be charged with the expense of one Major General only, and two brigadiers, and that no permanent arrangement which the President could make of the troops on the Peace Establishment should avail to defeat this purpose. This, however, is matter of inference from a general view of the policy of the law, which must yield to any express declaration of their purpose on the direct subject of pay; and on this subject they have expressly declared, as we have seen, that the rank and pay should be governed by the existing laws. Now, among the existing laws on the subject, is, that of the 16th of April, 1818, which recognises the brevets of the officers composing this establishment, and declares that they shall draw the pay of their brevets whenever they have a command according to their brevet rank, that is to say, (according to the correct exposition of this Department,) that those who hold the brevet of Major General shall draw the pay of that rank when they command divisions, which is the case here.

This conclusion seems to me to be forced upon us by this explicit provision on the subject of pay; and whether Congress foresaw this consequence or not, they seem to me to have rendered it impossible for us to avoid it by any fair process of reasoning. If, therefore, these gentlemen are in the command of divisions under the last arrangement, I think them entitled to the brevet pay of Major Generals from that period.

I have, &c. WILLIAM WIRT.

TRANSACTIONS IN THE FLORIDAS UNDER GOVERNOR JACKSON.

[Communicated to the House, January 29, 1822.]

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22, 1822.

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the 2d instant, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with all the documents relating to the misunderstanding between Andrew Jackson, while acting as Governor of the Floridas, and Eligius Fromentin, judge of a court therein; and also of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty on certain proceedings in that Territory, in execution of the powers vested in the Governor by the Executive, under the law of the last session, for carrying into effect the late treaty between the United States and Spain. Being always desirous to communicate to Congress, or to either House, all the information in the possession of the Executive, respecting any important interest of our Union, which may be communicated without real injury to our constituents, and which can rarely happen, except in negotiations pending with foreign Powers; and deeming it more consistent with the principles of our Government, in cases submitted to my discretion, as in the present instance, to hazard error by the freedom of the communication, rather than by withholding any portion of information belonging to the subject, I have thought proper to communicate every document comprised within this call.

JAMES MONROE.

PENSACOLA, August 26, 1821.

SIR: The enclosed documents will advise you of an occurrence painful to me, but unavoidably necessary, and dictated by the imperious rules of justice, to save the unprotected orphan from being ruined by the most cruel oppression, by the most corrupt and wicked combination I ever investigated.

In the re-establishment and resuscitation of the judiciary in West Florida, and from the various distribution of the judicial functions, I had indulged the hope that no cases would occur to compel me to exercise the judicial powers with which I was invested by my commission from the President.

I was well aware that much corruption existed in Spanish judicial proceedings, but still my mind was not prepared to expect such a scene of combined wickedness and corruption as has been brought to light by this investigation, and which the enclosed extracts, taken from the original documents or records, and certified by the alcalde of Pensacola, exhibit. They relate to the succession or estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal, who died in this place about the year 1807, having made his will, leaving persons in this country his heirs, but who, from that time to this day, have never received one cent of their inheritance. It was this case which gave rise to the proceedings alluded to, marked No. 1, and to which I beg leave to refer you.

The document No. 2 is an extract of the whole proceedings instituted by the heirs for the recovery of the testamentary papers and other documents relative to the estate of their deceased father, and for the recovery of which I was compelled to exercise my judicial functions, and to take the energetic measures I did; and which were well warranted by the laws of Spain as well as by those of the United States; and which alone could have preserved to the heirs of Vidal the evidence of their right of property. Without these records they would have been unable to compel the house of Innerarity & Forbes, the depositary and debtor of the estate, to do them right and justice. This act of justice was due to them by every law, human and divine. By the second article of the late treaty with Spain this right was expressly guaranteed, and, under that article, Col. Callava, as the Commissioner of Spain, was bound to deliver these documents, as the evidence of the right of property here, at the time of his surrendering the country, and with other papers which he did deliver.

It is clearly to be perceived that the influence of J. Innerarity prevented all the decrees of Callava, as well as of his predecessors, in favor of the heirs of Vidal, from being executed; thus exhibiting a judicial mockery without example. And by the influence and arts of this man, (and, as some have it, by his gold,) the final attempt was made secretly to carry away the papers relating to this large estate; by this means shielding Innerarity from all responsibility to the heirs, and enabling him to continue in undisturbed possession of property to a very large amount so unjustly, corruptly, and fraudulently obtained.

I have reason to believe that Callava would not have presumed to stand out in contempt of my order, but that he would have delivered the papers when first demanded, nay, that he would have directed Domingo Sousa to have done so, had he not been urged to this obstinate resistance by some of our American citizens, under the impression that I would not, nay, durst not, commit him for the contempt. This, added to the influence which Innerarity had over him, who was continually by his side, and, I am convinced, urging him to withhold the papers, from a belief that their production would unfold the villany practised, makes him responsible to the heirs, and destroys both his character and that of Callava. It was, no doubt, this conviction which caused him to make the involuntary exclamation, when my order was read to Colonel Callava by Colonel Butler, and when told, on his refusal to deliver the papers proven to be in his house, that he must appear before me, that "the die was cast." Yes, he said truly the die was cast; for he must have clearly seen that the arts, the influence, the wealth, the power of no individual, not even of Innerarity himself, could any longer obstruct the pure channels of justice.

I have to regret that the conduct of some of our officers on this occasion was highly reprehensible, and that in particular of Judge Fromentin unaccountable, indecorous, and unjustifiable. I have said indecorous, because, from an interview with him on the subject of his jurisdiction and powers under his commission and instructions, it was well understood that the former only extended over the revenue laws and the acts of Congress prohibiting the introduction of slaves. My commissions and instructions had been shown him, and he had acknowledged all other judicial powers to reside in the alcalde and in other judicial jurisdiction under me, as well as in those with which I was invested by the President. After this clear understanding between us, and his being instructed to aid me in the administration of the Government, to attempt thus to oppose me without even giving me notice, or making inquiry into the nature and cause of my proceedings; to issue what he calls a writ of habeas corpus, without petition or affidavit, or oath of any kind, and that on the application of Innerarity and of some Spanish officers, (the former interested in the destruction of these papers,) was such an act of indecorum and contempt of my authority, and displayed such ignorance of his duty, to say the least of it, as caused me to notify him to appear before me, and show cause why he had attempted this improper interference with me in the exercise of my judicial powers. The time when the interference was made renders his conduct still more reprehensible; he did know that opposition by force had been threatened by Callava and his Spanish officers to my authority, aided, as they had a right to believe, by some of my officers. This, as you will discover, I put down, as it ought to have been; and the lecture I gave the judge when he came before me will, I trust, for the future, cause him to obey the spirit of his commission, aid in the execution of the laws and administration of the Government, instead of attempting to oppose me, under Spanish influence.

I enclose you a copy of the paper he calls a writ of habeas corpus. If the view of this paper does not furnish sufficient evidence of his incapacity for the office of a judge; if it be not sufficient to strike him from the roll of judges, I must say that ignorance of law is no objection against any one's holding a judicial station, however high and important. Judge Fromentin was represented to me to be no lawyer, but favorably spoken of as a man of literature; but I could not have formed such an idea of his want of legal knowledge as this transaction displays. I am, therefore, more inclined to ascribe his conduct to weakness than to any other cause.

You will perceive, from the whole of the proceedings, that energetic measures were unavoidable, that my authority was attempted to be set at naught, and my orders and decrees treated with contempt. I could not view Colonel Callava in any other light than that of a private individual, charged with violating the rights of others, and setting my authority at defiance. I could not distinguish him or his situation from that of Domingo Sousa, or of Fullarat, his steward. These, by Callava's orders, had treated my authority with contempt, and Callava had not the magnanimity to relieve them, by acknowledging the papers to be in his possession, even after positive proof was had of the fact that they were so. I did believe, and ever will believe, that just laws can make no distinction of privilege between the rich and the poor; and that when men of high standing attempt to trample upon the rights of the weak, they are the fittest objects for example and punishment. In general, the great can protect themselves; but the poor and humble require the arm and the shield of the law. Colonel Callava's powers having ceased here with the surrender of the country, it was only a display, and so considered by me, of pompous arrogance and ignorance, in his claiming the privileges of diplomacy, which, in fact, he never possessed; and his powers having ceased, his commission accomplished, the pretension which he set up was an insult to the weakest understanding. There are other and many complaints by the Spanish subjects, who remain here, of documents relating to private property being missing from the alcalde's office. If proof is had where they are, demands will be made, and I hope the precedent set will prevent the necessity of again exercising those painful measures to coerce their production. But, should such occur, I shall not shrink from my duty, however painful it may be to my feelings to exercise such authority for the security of those individuals, who, under the treaty, look to our Government for the protection of their rights.

I enclose a memorandum, marked No. 3, which ought to have accompanied my last communication to you, and which records an occurrence that took place after the closing of my despatches of the 30th of July, concluded the 14th instant, and at the moment of their departure. This communication I could not receive until the inventory of provisions, &c., agreeably to Callava's agreement, and the pledge of his secretary, with the proper receipt, was delivered.

Enclosed you will receive an abstract of my accounts up to the 14th of August. In the month of October you will receive the whole by the hands of Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, who has acted as my private secretary, with all the necessary vouchers for closing my accounts.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great consideration and respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

P. S. I send you a newspaper containing an ordinance "for the better regulation of the harbor of Pensacola," and another, "regulating the fees of justices of the peace;" both of which have been passed since my last communication, and, from my ill health and great press of business, I send you through the paper enclosed.

Documents relating to the arrest of Domingo Sousa, Colonel Jose Callava, and Antoine Fullarat, enclosed in Governor Jackson's letter of the 26th of August, 1821.

No. 1.

From H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

SIR: I learn, from the most satisfactory evidence, that a number of documents relating to estates in this place, and to suits instituted here, are in the possession of an individual named Sousa. These papers properly belong to this office, but were not included in the inventory delivered by the late Governor. Some of the circumstances attending the affair are of a very peculiar nature; but as the necessity of obtaining possession of the documents is urgent, I must defer making a report respecting them to some other period. At present, I must request your Excellency to authorize some one to make a regular demand of the said documents, and to ascertain precisely what they are.

I am, &c.,

OFFICE OF EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
Pensacola, August 21, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: Having been officially informed that there are a number of papers or documents in the possession of an individual of the name of Domingo Sousa, of a public nature, and which belong to the office of the alcalde of this town, although not delivered with the other documents relating to private property, you are hereby authorized and instructed to proceed to the dwelling of the said Domingo Sousa, and to make a demand of all such papers or documents as may be in his possession. In case the said Sousa should refuse to exhibit and deliver the same, you will immediately report the fact to me in writing.

No. 3.

From the Commissioners, Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR: At an early hour yesterday morning we repaired to the dwelling of Domingo Sousa, and explained to him the object of our visit, and the authority with which we were clothed. He immediately produced two boxes containing papers, declaring that they belonged to the military tribunal, and to the revenue of Spain. On examining the said papers, it appeared that, with a few exceptions, they related to courts martial and to personal disputes between officers and soldiers, cognizable by the military tribunals. But the following papers we conceive to be of a very different nature: The proceedings relating to the estate of Nicholas Maria Vidal, formerly auditor of war of this province, and whose heirs reside in this place. They relate to property and claims in this country; and, whatever the Spanish law may be on the subject of the military privilege, by which the military courts have sole cognizance in all cases where persons of that profession are in any way interested, yet, in this case the persons now interested have nothing to do with the Spanish Government. Another package contains the papers in the case of Peter Guilkes against Tomas Villaseca, which relates to real property that has passed into other hands. There are also papers in the case of Manuel Bonfay against Carlos de Ville, relating to a lot of ground in Pensacola; also, the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra, relating to real property here, and in which other parties are now interested. These are all the papers we conceive important to the inhabitants here, excepting some cases of admiralty jurisdiction, and one as late as 1819; but which appear to be principally copies, the originals having been sent to Havana.

After having examined the whole of the papers in the possession of the said Sousa, we made a demand of the foregoing, but he refused to deliver them, declaring that he was merely the servant of the late Governor Callava, who had placed them in his hands, and that, without an order from him, they could not be given up to us. We then made a formal demand, in writing, and which is annexed to this report; and the same evening we received his answer, hereto annexed.

We then prepared the annexed letter of the 22d, but, when presented to him by Colonel Miller and H. M. Brackenridge, he declined receiving it, stating that he had no control over the papers; that Colonel Callava was the person of whom they must be demanded; and, therefore, refused to receive any letter from them. He further stated, that he had communicated the demand to Colonel Callava, who told him to answer by simply stating that he was subordinate to his (Callava's) orders. He said that, in order to relieve himself from the responsibility of keeping the papers, he was about to deliver them to the late Governor.

From Messrs Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to Mr. Sousa, referred to in the above report.

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

SIR: We have this day been authorized and instructed by his Excellency Gen. Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, to require you to deliver up certain public documents, which no private individual has a right to keep, as they relate to the rights of persons holding or claiming property in this province. Among these papers, it is believed there are the documents relating to the estate of Don Nicolas Vidal, whose heirs are interested in the same; also the papers relating to a house and lot in Pensacola, which was the subject of a proceeding between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; also a proceeding between Manuel Bonfay, and Carlos de Ville, relating to a piece of ground in this place; and also the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Thomas Villaseca, relating to real property in Pensacola. In pursuance of our instructions, we therefore make a formal demand of the foregoing, and of all other papers which relate directly to the right of private property in West Florida, and in which the inhabitants thereof are interested.

Secretary of West Florida.

MESSRS. ALCALDE AND SECRETARIES: I am a Spanish officer, staying at present in Pensacola, and subject by my commission to the orders of the late Governor of this place, Don Jose Callava; consequently, I have not under my charge, in quality of a private individual of this town, any papers which I am bound to deliver to you in compliance with your request. It is a positive fact, that I have exercised the functions of assistant witness (testigo de asistencia) for the suits in the courts of war and revenue in Pensacola, and under the Spanish Government, and that there are in my safe-keeping, boxed up, some of those papers intrusted to my care by the above-named Governor for their preservation. This is all I have to communicate to you in answer to the letter which you have been pleased to address to me to-day.

God preserve you many years.

From Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to Mr. Sousa.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR: Your note in reply to our demand of yesterday, has been received. You are in the exercise of no civil functions under the existing Government. We, therefore, can only regard you as a private person. We do not claim any papers in your possession, or in that of any other, relating to the military tribunals, or to the revenue of the Spanish Government; but we are certain that no individual, no matter what office he may have held under the Spanish Government, has any right to retain possession of archives or documents which relate directly to the sovereignty of this province; and no reason can be given why such papers as concern property in this country, and which may be necessary to establish titles or assert the rights of individuals, should be withheld from the officer now authorized to take charge of them.

We again make a positive demand of the papers mentioned in our note of yesterday, to wit: the documents in the case of Nicolas Maria Vidal; the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; also, a proceeding between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville, and the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca. These papers are known to be in your possession, and we demand to know by whose authority, as no person whatever has any right to authorize you to detain them.

Order to Colonel Butler and Doctor Brounagh.

OFFICE OF EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
Pensacola, August 22, 1821.

It being made known to me, by the confession of Domingo Sousa, that the papers named in the petition of Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, and which were demanded under my orders, as the property of private individuals, by Colonel George Walton, secretary for West Florida, Colonel John Miller, clerk of the country court of Escambia, and Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, were, after said demand, in pursuance of my orders as aforesaid, was made, by the said Domingo Sousa and a negro man carried this day to the house of the late Governor, Don Jose Callava, and delivered the said documents and papers into the possession of his steward, named Fullarat:

The documents and papers relating to the estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal. 2d. The documents in the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra. 3d. The documents and papers in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville. 4th. Documents and papers on the proceedings in the case of Peter Guilkes against Tomas Villaseca. All which documents and papers are acknowledged to be the property of individuals, and appertaining to their rights, and which are secured to them by and under the second article of the treaty with Spain, concluded at the city of Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819, and ratified on the corresponding day of 1821, and must remain for the protection of the rights and property of the said individuals; and no officer of Spain can rightfully take them away, or keep them from the office of the duly appointed alcalde for the city of Pensacola. It is further ordered, that if the said late Governor Don Jose Callava, or his steward Fullarat, when the above-described papers are demanded of them, should fail or refuse to deliver the same, that the said Don Jose Callava and his steward Fullarat be forthwith brought before me, at my office, then and there to answer such interrogatories as may be put to them of and concerning the premises, and to abide by and perform such order and decree touching the said documents and papers, (secured to them as aforesaid,) as the justice of the case may demand.

No. 13.

Report of Messrs. Butler and Brounagh.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR: Pursuant to your official order bearing this date, we proceeded to the house of Colonel

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

Callava, who was absent; but, again returning to his house shortly after, we found him, accompanied by a number of Spanish officers clothed with their side arms, and Mr. John Innerarity, in the porch. The demand was formally made of the documents enumerated in your order, and peremptorily refused; when he was informed that his refusal would be considered as setting at defiance the authority exercised by you as Governor of the Floridas, in the execution of the laws; and they were again demanded, and the consequences of refusal on his part enumerated, but in which refusal he still persisted; and we were about taking our leave to prepare for the final execution of your order, when Colonel Callava declared that if we would furnish him with a copy of the memorandum, setting forth the documents required, he would deliver them to us; to which we assented.

The alcalde, H. M. Brackenridge, accordingly waited on him with a copy of the memorandum herewith accompanied, and informed him that he would call in two hours for the reception of the documents, as promised. We proceeded at the appointed time, and found the gate and front part of the house closed. The former were opened by removing a bar, and, on reaching the latter, a considerable stir seemed to be making in the house. We knocked several times without receiving any answer, when admittance was demanded in the name of the Governor in three instances; still without reply. The guard was then ordered to advance and form in front of the house, and part detached to the rear, when it was discovered that the back door was open, and several Spanish officers, with Mr. Innerarity, (who is one of your cabildo,) were in the porch. We inquired for Colonel Callava, to which we were answered they did not know where he was. Lights were procured and the rooms searched, when Colonel Callava was found in his bed, divested of his coat. Demand was then made of the documents, agreeably to his promise, and to our astonishment they were still refused, and several attempts made on his part to show that he was not amenable to the laws; to which he was answered that the Governor was, in the execution of the laws, bound to demand the papers, as they appertained to the rights and property of individuals resident in Pensacola, and that formal complaint had been made that they were improperly withheld, and that the Governor knew no distinction between Colonel Callava and any other man under his Government. We then proposed that Colonel Callava should deliver the papers, and he should have our receipt for them; which was also refused. We then again demanded them, reiterating our sentiments that his refusal would be viewed as an act of open mutiny to the civil authority exercised in the Floridas, and that he must expect the consequences. He persisted to refuse, and the officer of the guard was ordered to take him and his steward Fullarat into custody, and bring them before your Excellency; which is now done. We would add, in conclusion, that Colonel Callava repeatedly asserted that he would not be taken out of his house alive, but he seemed to act without much difficulty when the guard was ordered to prime and load. A corporal and three men were detached to remain and guard the house of Colonel Callava, and to prevent the removal of the boxes which had contained the documents, and which Mr. Brackenridge recognised in the bed-room. From the relation in which Mr. Innerarity stands in this business, together with the interest taken on the side of Colonel Callava, and at the same time exercising the functions of one of the cabildo of this city, we deem it an indispensable duty to recommend that your Excellency will fill his place in the council with a character who will manifest a proper respect for the dignity of the laws and you their Executive.

We have the honor to be, &c.

Minutes of the examination of Colonel Callava and Fullarat.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
Pensacola, August 22, 1821.

Colonel Jose Callava being brought before Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, to answer certain interrogatories relative to documents and papers named in a schedule bearing this date, and which relate to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas, the following interrogatories were put to him, viz:

Question 1. Were or were not, the papers mentioned in a schedule handed to you by H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, delivered by Domingo Sousa at your house, this day, to Antoine Fullarat, your major domo; and, if so, at what time of the day?

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

Answer. Dixo que yo protesto solemnemente contra el acto, que son las diez y media de la noche, sacandole de sue cama, donde se hallaba enfermo; que se acopla como comisario, Española que es por el Gobierno Español, baxo el tratado recientemente celebrado con dicho Gobierno y el de los Estados Unidos por la cesion de las Floridas, cuya comision me ha sido confiado—here the Governor stopped Colonel Callava, and directed the following question to be put to him:

Did, or did not, Domingo Sousa deliver at your house this day the papers above mentioned; and, if so, where are those papers now? and answer this directly.

Answer. That he declines answering, except in the manner he considers proper, in his own language, and with his own hand.

The question being repeated, he answered that he was here as a commissioner, and could not answer in any other capacity. On which he was informed by the Governor that he could not view him as a commissioner, or in any other light than as a private individual, charged with refusing to surrender papers which belong to the public archives of this province, and of being connected with individuals charged with being about to secrete papers, and to carry them out of the country; by which the inhabitants thereof would be deprived of their evidence of property, and which, under the second article of the treaty with Spain, ought to have been delivered with the other papers placed in the charge of the alcalde for safe-keeping. The question being again repeated, he refused to answer except in the manner before stated.

Interrogatories put to Antoine Fullarat.

Question 1. What is your name and age.

OFFICE OF EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
Pensacola, August 22, 1822.

WEST FLORIDA, Pensacola, ss.

To the officer of the day.

You will take into custody and safely keep Domingo Sousa, until he produces, or causes to be produced and delivered, unto Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde of Pensacola, the following documents and papers, to wit: Those relating to the estate of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal; also, the papers relating to a house and lot in Pensacola, which was the subject of a proceeding between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; also, the proceedings which took place between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville, relating to a piece of ground in this place; and, also, the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca, relating to real property in Pensacola; all which documents and papers appear to appertain to individuals and their rights, and for their benefit ought to be in the possession of Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, and not to be taken away by the officers of Spain; and which documents and papers were seen by Colonel George Walton, Colonel John Miller, and Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde, in the possession of the said Domingo Sousa, on the 21st instant, and demanded by the said alcalde to be delivered to him, the said alcalde, under the written order of the undersigned, given for that purpose, and the said documents and papers to be retained by the said alcalde for safe keeping: on which the said Domingo Sousa refused to deliver the same, but, in open violation of the above-recited order and demand, did convey the said documents and papers to the house of Colonel Jose Callava, late Spanish Governor of the province of West Florida, and left them in the hands of the said Colonel Callava's steward, by name Fullarat, in the dwelling-house of the said Colonel Callava. All which acts aforesaid of the said Domingo Sousa are in open contempt of the authority of the undersigned, as Governor of the Floridas, &c., and in open violation of the rights of the citizens, secured to them under the second article of the late treaty with Spain; for all which, and until he, the said Domingo Sousa, complies with the foregoing order, by delivering the aforesaid enumerated documents and papers, he is to stand committed to the calaboose.

Given under my hand this twenty-second day of August, eighteen hundred and twenty-one.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Governor of the Floridas, &c.

WEST FLORIDA, Pensacola, ss.

To Captain Dade, officer of the day.

You will take into custody and safely keep Colonel Don Jose Callava, and his steward Fullarat, until the documents and papers recited in the order annexed for the arrest of Domingo Sousa are produced and delivered unto Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola.

No. 17.

H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 23, 1821.

SIR: Having strong grounds to believe that the documents and papers claimed by me as appertain-ing to the archives of this province, and directly relating to the property and sovereignty of the same, are now in the house of Don Jose Callava, but enclosed in boxes, I beg leave to request that authority may be given to such persons as your Excellency may appoint to open and examine the said boxes and report thereon. From the examination of Domingo Sousa and Antoine Fullarat, and the affidavit hereto annexed of Mercedes Vidal, there can be no doubt but that said documents were delivered in the boxes before mentioned to the said Callava, at his house, and are in his possession.

The documents demanded are as follows:

1. Papers relating to the estate of Nicholas Maria Vidal.
2. Proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.
3. Proceedings in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville.
4. Documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Thomas Villaseca.

Affidavit of Mercedes Vidal.

WEST FLORIDA.

Before me, H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, personally appeared Mercedes Vidal Padro, who, being of full age, and being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that her father, Nicholas Maria Vidal, left her by will one of his heirs, and that he died about the year 1806, possessed of a large real and personal estate in Florida and Louisiana. The deponent further saith, that the will of her said father, together with the inventories of his real and personal estate, and all the papers relating thereto, were for several years missing from the public archives of Pensacola, having been by some person withdrawn from the same; that repeated solicitations were made by her to the authorities then existing here to compel the restoration of the said papers and documents, as they were, and, she believes, still are, necessary to enable her to prosecute her claims under the said will; that a certain John Innerarity of this place, whom this deponent believes to be a debtor to the said estate in a large amount, was decreed to restore the said papers in his possession; that the said papers were finally restored, and that a decree was passed against the said Innerarity to account with the deponent as one of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal. The deponent further states that, a few days before the change of Governments, she demanded them of Colonel Callava, who informed her that he could not give them up, as he was obliged to take them to Havana. The deponent afterwards requested permission to make a copy of them; that this was granted by said Callava on condition that they should only be delivered by separate pieces or parcels, and that a confidential person should be found to copy them; but the deponent says that the expense of copying them exceed her means, as they amount, in all, to several hundred pages of writing paper. The deponent afterwards learned that the said papers were in the actual possession of Domingo Sousa, who acknowledged the same, and delivered three pieces to her for the purpose of being copied. The deponent further states that the said papers relate to property in this country and Louisiana, and were necessary in order to enable her to prosecute her claims under the will of her father.

And his Excellency issued the following further order, viz:

Eligius Fromentin, Esq., will forthwith be and appear before me, to show cause why he has attempted to interfere with my authority as Governor of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and Intendant of the island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of said provinces, respectively, in my judicial capacity as supreme judge over the same, and as chancellor thereof, having committed certain individuals charged with a combination to secrete, and with having attempted to secrete and carry out of the territories ceded to the United States the evidence of individual right to property within the said territories, which has been secured to each individual under the second article of the late treaty with Spain, and in open contempt of the orders and decrees made by me. And that the said Eligius Fromentin, Esq., be and appear before me, at my office, at five o'clock P. [Enclosure No. 2, in Governor Jackson's letter of 26th August, 1821.—2 in 1.]

Mr. Brackenridge to Governor Jackson.

PENSACOLA, August 24, 1821.

SIR: The following are the facts supporting my application to your Excellency in relation to papers which, as alcalde, and specially commissioned keeper of the archives delivered in virtue of the treaty with Spain, I conceived ought to be placed in my charge, and which no individual had a right to retain:

Shortly after my appointment, an application was made to me by a free quadroon woman of this place, who stated that she was one of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, formerly the auditor de guerra, or judge. She placed in my hands a number of original papers and decrees, which evidently could not be properly retained by any individual, but belonged to the archives. These papers were retained by me. On examining them, I found that they principally consisted of petitions on the part of the heirs of Vidal, praying the interposition of the existing authorities to compel John Innerarity to restore to the archives the papers relating to the estate of their deceased father, so as to enable them to substantiate their claims against the said Innerarity. These were followed by repeated decrees, but without effect—at least from aught that appears in their proceedings. From others of these documents, it would appear that they had been restored; various decrees in favor of the heirs had passed; but, since July, 1820, nothing seems to have been done, in consequence, as I have been informed, of the departure of the auditor, or judge. I did not find the papers in the office, and I did not know, until afterwards informed by Mercedes Vidal, where they were. As they related to property in this country, and were necessary for the establishment of the rights of its inhabitants, it seemed to me self-evident that they could only be lawfully in the possession of the Government, and that they might be taken wherever they could be found. About ten days ago, Mercedes Vidal informed me that they were in the hands of one Domingo Sousa, formerly a clerk in the office, but that they were under the control of the late Governor Callava, who had given her permission to copy them; but, as they consisted, like other Spanish documents, of the original papers stitched together, and were in separate pieces or unbound books, she could only be allowed to take one of them at a time. I told her to obtain one of them, and bring it to me, in order that I might be certain of the fact. As soon as this was done, and being well convinced of the truth of her story, I made my application to you of the 21st of August, conceiving that the papers must be restored, as no individual could possess them without the permission of the existing Government.

From the following abstract of the proceedings instituted by the heirs of Vidal for the restoration of those papers to the archives, your Excellency will perceive with how much difficulty this object was obtained. On the 29th of August, 1817, a petition was presented to the Governor by Caroline Vidal, one of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, setting forth that, since the sale of her deceased father's effects at public auction, she was unacquainted with the situation of his estate, and praying that the papers relating to it might be delivered to her for this purpose, on her giving the proper receipt. On this, there is a decree by Mazot, then Governor, dated 1st of September, 1817, ordering the papers to be delivered to her, under her receipt. There then follows a certificate from the clerks, or witnesses de asistencia, of their having waited on John Innerarity to demand the said papers, and that they were informed by his bookkeeper that he was at the river Perdido. The demand is made, it is said, in virtue of their having been delivered to him by the deceased Governor Zuniga.

On the 3d of the same month they again proceeded to the house of Innerarity, who repaired to the auditor's office, and prayed that eight or ten days might be allowed him, that he might search for them, as he did not know with certainty where his bookkeeper had put them at the time of the prevailing reports that this place was about to be surprised by the insurgents. This appears to have been granted.

The next petition of Caroline Vidal is dated 1st of December, 1817, stating that, notwithstanding the various solicitations on her part for the delivery to her of the proceedings following the decease of her father, so that, by a sight of them, she might know what is justly due to her, without which she would not be able to do so, she again prays that they may be delivered to her on giving a receipt; and, if not in the public archives, that it be certified in whose possession they were. On this a decree was entered by Mazot, again requiring Innerarity to deliver the testamentary acts of Nicolas Maria Vidal. The clerk accordingly made the demand of Innerarity, who replied that he had not been able to find them, but believed that they had been sent to Mobile in a trunk, with other papers, about the time this place was threatened by the insurgents, and, if in his possession at all, they were at that place; but he was not certain whether he had not returned them to Don Francisco Gutierrez de Arroyo.

The next petition of Caroline Vidal is dated the 28th of February, 1818, renewing her demand for the delivery of the testamentary papers, or acts of her father, enumerating the different evasive answers of Innerarity, and praying that if, in fact, they had been transmitted from Mobile to Havana by Arroyo, they might be reclaimed from the Intendant. This prayer is granted by Mazot, but does not appear to have produced any effect.

After this follows a petition by Mercedes Vidal, co-heiress of Nicolas Maria Vidal, setting forth the solicitations of her sister to compel Innerarity to restore the testamentary papers of her deceased father, in consequence of whose failure to do so the heirs had not been able to claim their rights under the will of their father. The petition contains these words: "If a private individual could be authorized to take away from the public archives papers of the greatest importance, and then excuse himself on the ground that they had been delivered to Peter or to John, and thus escape without any further trouble, nothing would be secure, and the laws of justice and society would be overturned;" and then praying that Innerarity be required, for the last time, to restore the papers, and that he be put in close confinement until he shall deliver the papers necessary to substantiate claims under an estate which, until now, the heirs thereof have been unable to make. Then follows the decree of Governor Callava, dated 31st of March, 1819, that the petition pass to the auditor, that the proper order be taken thereon. Upon this, by order of the 5th of April, 1819, Innerarity is required to restore the papers, if in his possession; but this also appears to have been without effect.

The next petition of Mercedes Vidal prays that the following interrogatories may be put to Innerarity:

1st. Whether he is the depositary of the estate of the deceased Nicolas Maria Vidal, the petitioner's father?

2d. Whether sixteen thousand acres of land in the district of Baton Rouge were sold at public sale at that place, and for what price?

3d. Whether the executor named in due form by the said Nicolas Maria Vidal, Cristoval de Annas, protested against the sale as a nullity, and in derogation of the rights of the heirs?

4th. Whether, when the sixteen thousand acres were adjudged at public sale, Cristoval de Annas did not demand the preference in behalf of the minors?

5th. To whom did John Innerarity give an account of the deposite placed in his hands?

6th. For what reason did Innerarity take away the testamentary papers and inventories, and other papers belonging to the succession of the said Nicolas Maria Vidal; and if, on taking them out, he gave a receipt; and by whose order they were given?

Then follows the order of Callava, dated 17th May, 1819, that the petition pass to the assessor. On the 18th, there is the further order of Callava that John Innerarity appear at the office of the auditor, at eleven o'clock of that day, to answer to such interrogatories as should be put to him touching the premises. He accordingly appeared, and said that, in the possession of neither the keeper of the archives, nor of any other person, is there a receipt showing in whose hands the documents claimed then were. If, in other proceedings, he had declared that he would look for them among his papers, it was from a belief that he had seen them in the possession of Francisco Arroyo, who used to come frequently to his house. That they might have been mingled with some of his own papers, and on that account he offered to make search for them among those in his house, as he had formerly done as to those he had at Mobile; but, not having found them, he hoped this would be considered sufficient. This is also accompanied by a formal writing from Innerarity, in the nature of a demurrer, setting forth that, under the laws of Castile, he is not bound to answer; as no litigant can, according to those laws, begin by propounding questions to the opposite party; that proofs should be brought against him, instead of compelling him to furnish evidence against himself. Then follows an order of Callava that it pass to the assessor. An order is then given to examine the book of receipts, to see to whom the papers were delivered; on which the clerks certify that, on examination of the book of receipts from 1813 until the time of making the search, no receipt could be found. This application does not appear to have been effectual.

The next paper is a petition of considerable length by Mercedes Vidal, setting forth the manner in which the heirs of Vidal had for four years been kept out of their inheritance, in consequence of which they had been reduced to extreme poverty; the injustice they had experienced in the fraudulent sale of their estate in the district of Baton Rouge; and their unavailing efforts to obtain the testamentary papers of their deceased father, or to compel those to account who had their property in their hands. Upon this petition there is a decree of the auditor de guerra of the 25th of June, 1819, annulling, on legal grounds, the sale of the property at Baton Rouge, and decreeing that the heirs be put in possession thereof, signed by Governor Callava; and, in pursuance of this decree, it is certified by the clerks that they have delivered the original of this proceeding, in order that it may be carried into effect; on which follows a writing addressed by Callava to the judges of the district of Baton Rouge, stating that the sale of the estate of Vidal, in that district, to the prejudice of the interests of minors, has been set aside; but, as his jurisdiction does not extend there, he sends the original proceedings had in his tribunal, in order that the decrees therein may be carried into effect, dated the 26th of June, 1819. From none of the foregoing proceedings does it appear that the testamentary papers had at this time been returned.

The next document in order is the petition of Mercedes Vidal, setting forth her repeated solicitations, and those of her sister; the continued evasions of Innerarity; his perseverance in refusing to deliver up the testamentary papers of her deceased father; that, at length, forced by her continued petitions, and those of her sister, he had surrendered said papers, to all appearances complete. That, from positive data, on the inspection of those documents, it appeared that they were entitled to have certain specified proceedings under the will set aside as irregular and fraudulent; that property to a large amount, which had been left on deposit in the Ursuline convent in New Orleans, had been seized by Forbes and Innerarity, and that no account had been rendered by them of the same; that a large sum of money had been placed in deposit in their hands, for which they had not accounted. The prayer of the petitioner is, that the proceedings under the will be annulled; that the house of Forbes and Innerarity be required to account, &c.

The decree of the auditor, Suares, follows at considerable length, declaring that the proceedings under the will had been wholly irregular, and formed a confused mixture of one thing and another, a perfect labyrinth, which could only be ascribed to the malice of some persons, and the want of a litrado, or legal judge, to direct the parties. The irregularities are then detailed at large. The auditor then sets forth that, in order to avoid confusion, there should be two separate proceedings: one with respect to the demand of the heirs to annul what had been done under the will; and the other requiring the house of Forbes and Innerarity to account with the heirs. The first to consist of the former proceeding and this decree, and the documents on which they are founded, to be separated from the rest of the proceedings for this purpose; that, before proceeding to the annulling of the sale of the sixteen thousand acres of land at Baton Rouge, it would be proper to hear the party at whose instance the sale had been made, that is to say, Don John Forbes & Co., which company is at present represented by John Innerarity; and that the proceedings, with the previous instances in the name of the heirs, should be communicated to the latter. As to the account demanded of Innerarity, and which had been demanded of him ever since the year 1810, without ever having been obeyed, he is required within ten days to produce the same, exact and in due form, and, on failure thereof, to be subjected to what in such case would be exacted by justice; and that within the fifth day he place in the royal treasury the sums put in his possession in the character of a depositary, together with the sixteen hundred dollars mentioned in page sixty-five of the proceedings. The foregoing dictamen or decree is ordered to be carried into effect in all its parts. Signed Callava, 1st July, 1820.

The next and last petition of Mercedes Vidal sets forth the foregoing decree; that the time for the accomplishment of the same had elapsed; that nothing had been done by Innerarity to comply therewith. She therefore prays that execution may issue against the goods of Innerarity, to compel him to comply with the said decree; that, until the rights of the petitioner can be established, and until he shall exhibit an account of the effects sold in New Orleans, as expressed in the Governor's decree of the 1st of July, the property of said Innerarity be placed under an interdict. On this follows the decree of Callava of the 10th of July, 1820, granting the prayer of the foregoing petition.

This closes the proceedings; no further steps appear to have been taken since that time. There is a petition of Mercedes Vidal on the subject of the decree of the 10th, but no order has been taken on it.

I do hereby, in my official capacity as alcalde of Pensacola, and keeper of the archives delivered under the treaty, certify the foregoing to be a correct abstract of the proceedings in my office, at the instance of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, for the recovery of the testamentary papers of their deceased father, and which led to the late proceedings against Domingo Sousa, clerk of Don Jose Callava, and his steward Fullarat.

[Enclosure No. 3, in Governor Jackson's letter of the 26th August, 1821.—3 in 1.

Memorandum extracted from the record-book of Major General Jackson, &c.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that, at noon, on this day, 16th August, 1821, as General Jackson was about to forward his despatches to the Government of the United States, Captain B. Prieto, aid-de-camp to Don Jose Callava, late commissioner on the part of Spain for the delivery of West Florida, presented himself, in our presence, before General Jackson, as the bearer of a communication from said Spanish commissioner to General Jackson, which the latter refused to receive, without having previously delivered to him, in the form required, the certificate of receipt of provisions furnished by him to the Spanish troops for the voyage from this place to the Havana, and the transportation of civil officers, &c.; which provisions and transportation were not stipulated in the seventh article of the late treaty between Spain and the United States to be furnished by the latter. That General Jackson declared, as the reason of his refusal, that the above-mentioned certificate had been promised to be delivered, in proper form, with the solemn pledge of Jose Cruzat, secretary to the said commissioner, upon that gentleman's representing, on the morning of the 17th of July, that said commissioner, from sickness and extreme press of business, could not furnish the above certificate in time for the ceremony of giving possession; which promise and pledge had been disregarded and violated. We further certify that, upon General Jackson's refusal to receive the communication referred to, Captain Prieto withdrew, and a short time afterwards returned, stating that he had been instructed by Don Jose Callava to request of General Jackson to reconsider the subject, as it was one of great importance, and that he would be obliged, should General Jackson persist in his refusal, to report the circumstances to his Government. That General Jackson replied simply by a repetition of what he had said before, viz: that the sole condition on which he would receive the late Spanish commissioner's communication was the previous delivery, on his part, of the certificate in question, drawn up in the form which the tenor of the correspondence required; upon which delivery, he would receive any communication which Colonel Callava might make: when Captain Prieto took his leave.

Major General Jackson to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, September 30, 1821.

SIR: I have not had the pleasure of receiving any letter from you since yours of the 20th ultimo, and, in compliance with your instructions therein, am preparing a report on the subjects alluded to which shall be forwarded in due time.

I had hoped, when I last addressed you, that nothing would have occurred here, after the unpleasant affair of Callava, to compel me to notice the conduct of those Spanish officers who remained; that a decent regard for the laws and the chief magistracy of the country would have induced them to demean themselves peaceably during their temporary stay. But in this I have been mistaken, and, by a reference to the within proclamation and a newspaper of the 29th instant, you will see the step I have been compelled to take, and the course which has led to it.

You will find, over the signature of the "Spanish officers," a violation of that decency and respect which is due to me, as the supreme judicial tribunal of this country, and to my sworn interpreters.

I should have been unworthy the important and sacred trust reposed in me by the President of the United States, if I could, for a moment, have suffered the dignity and majesty of the laws to be thus outraged, in that of my person and my interpreters, with impunity. So long as they confined themselves to a justification of themselves, it was well; but the moment they attacked with their gross falsehoods the dignity of the court and its officers, it became my duty to act with promptness. I have taken this step, after mature reflection and deliberation, believing it absolutely necessary for the preservation of the peace, harmony, and good government of the country. It will not do to permit a band of Spanish officers to keep the public mind in a constant state of excitement and alarm, and thereby weaken that alliance of the creoles of the country to the General Government, which is enjoined on them by my proclamation; and which, I have every reason to believe, they were disposed to yield, had it not been for the undue influence of those turbulent men, moved by others, who work unseen. To suffer them to remain here, after being aware of these things, and showing they defied my authority, considering themselves independent of my rule, and subordinate only to that of their chief, would have been highly improper, and could not have met the approbation of my Government. As long as I have the honor of commanding here, the Government and laws shall be respected; and all who deport themselves with becoming propriety shall receive every attention, urbanity, and politeness due them. Instead of Judge Fromentin aiding me in the administration of the Government, I have strong reasons for believing he is exciting the course that has been pursued by these Spanish officers.

I enclose, for your information and that of the President, my opinion and that of my legal associate on the question of my judicial jurisdiction and powers in the Floridas, and our decision on the case that gave rise to it. If I am correct in the construction of my judicial powers, (of which I have no doubt,) I should have been warranted in committing all concerned. I was advised to do so by those most friendly to the Government, but I thought it best to extend to them all the lenity in my power, and have only, in the first place, required them to leave this country, as they were bound to do by the seventh article of the treaty. All of which will more fully appear; having reference to my proclamation.

I am, sir, with sincere regard and respect, your most obedient servant.

ANDREW JACKSON.

PROCLAMATION.

By Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the provinces of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the Island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of the said provinces, respectively:

Whereas, by the seventh article of the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain on the 22d day of February, 1819, and duly ratified, it was stipulated that the "officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty, in the territories hereby ceded to the United States, shall be withdrawn, and possession of the places occupied by them shall be given within six months after the ratification of the treaty, or sooner, if possible:" and whereas it has this day been made known to me that the following officers of His Catholic Majesty, to wit, Marcos de Villiers, Bernardo Prieto, Louis Gayarre, Civilo Lessassier, Arnaldo Guille-mard, Carlos de Villiers, Pedro de Vegas, and Mariane Latady, and who, according to the said seventh article, ought to have withdrawn from the said ceded territory with the troops of His Catholic Majesty, have, without the permission of the existing authorities, contrary to the said seventh article, remained in this city and its vicinity: and whereas it has been made known to me that the said officers, acting in a distinct body, independent of and disowning even a temporary allegiance to the Government of the United States as existing in the Floridas, have been engaged in stirring up disaffection thereto, and in sowing discontent in the minds of the good people of this said province: and whereas it appears that they are the authors of the following false, scandalous, and indecent publication:

"In speaking of Colonel Callava's appearance before General Jackson, H. B. ought to have stated that none of the interrogatories and highly offensive accusations of the General were faithfully interpreted to Colonel Callava, any more than the replies of the latter to the former. It was, therefore, out of the power of our chief, not knowing what was said to him, to make the auditory understand how innocent he was of the foul charges with which his unsullied honor was endeavored to be stained. Such, in sum, are the observations we had to make on the statement of H. B., and we hope that he and the public will be convinced that we acted from no principle of pusillanimity; that if, on the one hand, we shuddered at the violent proceedings exercised against our superior, we knew also what was due to a Government which is on the most friendly footing with our own.

"We are, &c.

and whereas the said publication is calculated to excite resistance to the existing Government of the Floridas, and to disturb the harmony, peace, and good order of the same, as well as to weaken the allegiance enjoined by my proclamation, heretofore published, and is entirely incompatible with any privileges which could have been extended to the said officers, even if permission had been expressly given them to remain in the said province, and, under existing circumstances, a gross abuse of the lenity and indulgence heretofore extended to them:

This is, therefore, to make known to the said officers to withdraw themselves, as they ought heretofore to have done, from the Floridas, agreeably to the said seventh article, on or before the third day of October next; after which day, if they or any of them shall be found within the Floridas, all officers, civil and military, are hereby required to arrest and secure them, so that they may be brought before me, to be dealt with according to law, for contempt and disobedience to this my proclamation.

Given at Pensacola, this twenty-ninth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, and of the independence of the United States the forty-sixth.

JUDICIAL OPINION.

HEIRS OF VIDAL vs. JOHN INNERARITY.

A petition was filed in this case, praying the court to have John Innerarity cited to appear and show cause why the decrees of Don Jose Callava, late Governor of West Florida, should not be carried into execution. Upon the return day of the citation, John Innerarity, the defendant, appeared, and prayed time to prepare his defence, which was granted him. At the expiration of the time allowed, he, through his counsel, prayed for further time, which was also granted. The court having met on the day appointed for the hearing, and the case being called, Mr. Acre, of counsel for the defendant, filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, which brings up the question, not only whether this court can legally entertain the suit, but whether there is a competent tribunal in the country to try the case. In support of this plea, he took the following grounds: First, he conceded that the Governors of the Floridas acted in a judicial capacity, and had done so time out of mind, until the promulgation of the constitution of the Cortes of Spain, some time in 1820; and as the constitution of the Cortes was in force in Spain at the time that the sovereignty of Spain over the Floridas was ceded to the United States, it was a part of the law of the Floridas. By that constitution, the judicial power, before exercised by the Governors, was taken from them, and given to other tribunals; and, as a deduction from these premises, Governor Jackson could not sit as a court, only having the powers of the Governors of the Floridas, the Captain General of Cuba, and the Intendant, as limited and prescribed by the constitution of the Cortes, published some time in 1820. Mr. Brackenridge, on the part of the petitioners, contended that the Spanish Government, of which the judiciary is part, has ceased, although the laws and usages are still in force. The error of opinion on this subject, he said, arises from not distinguishing these things. The powers executed by the officers of Spain are retained, not the officers; and an entirely different distribution made of them, to which the President was authorized by the act of Congress. That the Spanish constitution is not in force here, because not promulgated until Spain had parted with the sovereignty, and because it merely provides a form of government; it is not, therefore, applicable to us. He contended, from the act of Congress, and the Governor's commission, it was, undoubtedly, the intention of the President to give the same powers as had formerly been exercised by Governor Claiborne in Louisiana, on taking possession of that country, under similar circumstances. The constitution of the Cortes, he said, must be referred to, to ascertain the powers of the Captain General, Intendant, and Governors of the Floridas; for, in that case, he went on to show, that the country would be left without civil government of any kind. According to that constitution, the Captain General is only a military officer, and the Governors of the Floridas are military officers under him. As Intendant, he would have no power.

The very able and satisfactory discussion this question has undergone by the gentlemen of the bar, by which the court was not only delighted, but instructed, has stripped it, in a great measure, of its difficulty. It, however, remains one of the first importance to the rights of the people of this country, and, as such, has received the most anxious consideration and attention of the court. Judicial power is an important trust, its execution often painful, and it does not hold out sufficient attractions to cause it to be sought after, especially by those who are duly and truly impressed with its awful responsibilities. It now becomes necessary for the court to inquire whether there exists sufficient judicial power in this country, since the change of sovereignty, to carry into effect the decrees of the late Governor of West Florida. If there is, where is it vested? It was not seriously contended that jurisdiction did not rest somewhere; but the difficulty on the part of the defendant's counsel consisted in pointing out the tribunal. By referring to the act of Congress, entitled "An act to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain," the second section of which is in these words, "And be it further enacted, That, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said Territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the same Territories shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for the maintaining the inhabitants of said Territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, subject to the modification stipulated by the fifteenth article of said treaty, in favor of Spanish vessels and their cargoes, and the laws relating to the importation of persons of color, shall be extended to the said Territories. And the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, within the term aforesaid, to establish such districts for the collection of the revenue, and during the recess of Congress to appoint such officers, whose commissions shall expire at the end of the next session of Congress, to enforce the said laws, as to him may seem expedient;" there is no stipulation in the treaty that the sovereignty of Spain over the Floridas should continue in force one moment after the signing of the treaty, and certainly not after the time limited by it for its ratification. In morals and good faith the sovereignty was, from that time, in the United States de jure, and Spain only had the Government de facto. The act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty had relation back to that time, as is fully expressed in the ratification, not only of Spain, but the United States; and the United States are only bound to maintain the inhabitants of the ceded country in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

We will here read the commission given by the President to Major General Andrew Jackson, and see what powers it has pleased the President to invest him with; which commission is in the following words, viz:

"JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Whereas the Congress of the United States, by an act passed on the third day of the present month, did provide that, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the Territories of East and West Florida, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty between the said parties, concluded at Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said Territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: Now, know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and abilities of Major General Andrew Jackson, I do, in virtue of the above recited act, appoint him to exercise, within the said ceded Territories, under such circumstances as have been, or may hereafter be prescribed to him by my instructions, and by law, all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the Governor and Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, and by the Governors of East and West Florida, within the said provinces, respectively; and do authorize and empower him, the said Andrew Jackson, to execute and fulfil the duties of this present appointment according to law; and to have and to hold the same, with all its powers and privileges, until the end of the next session of Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the government of the said Territories so ceded by Spain to the United States: Provided, however, and it is the true intent and meaning of these presents, That the said Andrew Jackson, or any person acting under him, or in the said Territories, shall have no power or authority to lay or collect any new or additional taxes, or to grant or confirm to any person or persons whomsoever, any title or claims to land within the same.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, the tenth day of March. A. D. one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, and of the independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

"JAMES MONROE.

"By the President:

"JOHN Q. ADAMS."

From this commission we collect the fact that it was the will and intention of the President to invest Governor Jackson with all the civil, military, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the Spanish Government over the Floridas before the change of sovereignty, as he was empowered by the second section of the act of Congress before recited, with such limitations, and subject to such instructions, as it might please the President from time to time to prescribe. The said powers, given as aforesaid, are limited only by the following instructions and reservations of the President, which are, that the Governor of the Floridas shall have no power or authority to lay or collect any new or additional taxes, or to grant or confirm to any person or persons whomsoever any title or claims to land within the same. From the exceptions themselves, we arrive at the conclusion that all the civil, military, and judicial powers are given, with this further exception—such parts of them as are conferred on others; for all the above powers are vested somewhere, being absolutely necessary to carry on the Government.

The argument of the defendant's counsel against the jurisdiction of this court is predicated on the supposition that the constitution published by the Cortes of Spain is in force in this country; and, if we can show that it is not, it totally fails. We will here give a succinct history of this constitution, and show that it is not in force.

Some time in the year 1812, Ferdinand VII., King of Spain, was a prisoner in France; the Cortes, during the King's exile, framed the Constitution, and published it in Old Spain; some sections of Old Spain adopted and others rejected

it. But it never was promulgated in any of the transmarine provinces of Spain, or any decree under it, during the time of Ferdinand's absence, so far as we have been able to learn, after diligent research and inquiry. On the 4th day of May, 1814, Ferdinand VII., having previously returned to Spain, and assumed the royal functions, by a solemn decree promulgated over his whole empire, dissolved the Cortes, annulled all their decrees, and made it treason in his subjects, or any of them, to attempt to carry the constitution or decrees under it into effect. In this situation the Government of Spain remained at the conclusion of the treaty between the United States and Spain, signed by their respective Plenipotentiaries on the 22d day of February, 1819. The ratification of this treaty was unaccountably delayed on the part of Spain till the 24th of October, 1820. By the sixteenth article of the treaty, it was to have been ratified in six months next after the 22d of February, 1819, viz: on the 22d of August, 1816, or sooner, if possible. And, in the ratification, Ferdinand VII., by the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation, declared that the ratification should be as valid and firm, and produce the same effects, as if it had been done within the determined period, viz: the time prescribed by the seventh article. This, of itself, is sufficient to exclude the idea that the constitution of the Cortes is in force in this country. If any thing else is wanting, we have the fact that the constitution of the Cortes was only promulgated in the island of Cuba some time in the month of January, 1821, (about three months after Spain had parted with the sovereignty of the Floridas;) and, if it was ever promulgated in these provinces, it must have been after that time, and long since Ferdinand VII., in ratifying the treaty by the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation, had parted with the sovereignty, &c.

It cannot be seriously contended by the defendant's counsel that any act of Spain, after the ratification of the treaty, could be considered in force in the country ceded, by virtue of the proclamation of the Executive of this country. Such a construction and such doctrine is incompatible with the sovereignty of the United States over the Floridas. But it is said that the proclamation declares that all the laws and municipal regulations of Spain are in force. It must be remembered that the first part of that section of the proclamation alluded to, states that the government of Spain has ceased, and that of the United States has commenced; these words qualify those general words relied on, and limit them to mean only so far as is compatible with the change of sovereignty. As well might he contend that Spain can legislate at this time for the Floridas. Legislation being one of the attributes of sovereignty, must exclusively belong to the sovereign power. Can it be seriously contended that the constitution of Spain is in force here, as one of the laws and municipal regulations, continued in force by the proclamation of the Governor, founded on the act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty? We have now clearly proved, we believe, that the constitution of the Cortes is not in force here. By the second section of the act just referred to, the President of the United States is authorized to have the civil, military, and judicial powers exercised in such manner as he may direct; for it cannot be contended that he has not authority to place the judicial power wherever he pleases.

We will now proceed to show that the President did not consider the constitution of the Cortes was in force in this country; and for which purpose it is only necessary to refer to the President's instructions, contained in the Governor's commission; wherein he takes from him the power of granting or making concessions of lands, or confirming those previously made.

Now, if he considered the constitution of the Cortes in force in this country, to have given these instructions, or expressly to have limited his powers in these particulars, would have been useless and unnecessary, as the constitution of the Cortes took away from the Captain General, the Intendant, and Governors of provinces, the power of granting lands; therefore, on conferring on Major General Jackson the commission of Governor of the Floridas, to exercise the powers of the Captain General and Intendant of the island of Cuba and Governor of the Floridas, he did not intend that those powers should be limited and prescribed by the constitution of the Cortes, but that he should exercise them as they were exercised on the 22d of February, 1819, the day on which the treaty was signed. We, therefore, think Governor Jackson has the power to carry into effect the decrees of the late Governor of the Floridas. The counsel for the defendant, in his very able and ingenious argument, suggested that, as the President had appointed a judge of the United States for West Florida, possibly his tribunal might have jurisdiction of this case. He admitted, however, that he could not have jurisdiction, unless it was positively given him by statute, or the express instructions of the President. From the commission read, and the deductions already made, it fully appears that the jurisdiction of this case has been conferred on the Governor, and cannot be presumed to be given to the judge. Having seen the commission of the judge, he is expressly required, by instructions contained in it, to consider himself as governed by the laws of the United States; and the inquiry now is, what laws of the United States are extended to the Floridas, taken in contradistinction to the Spanish laws in force here? From the second section of the act, entitled "An act to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain," before read, we find that only such laws as relate to the revenue, and the importation of people of color, are extended to the Floridas. And as these subjects have been expressly excepted, and taken out of the general powers of the Governor, it is fair to presume that these subjects, and the cases arising under the two laws of the United States expressly extended to this country, are alone the legitimate objects of the judge's jurisdiction, until the contrary be shown from any instructions he may have from the President of the United States. In short, the judge's jurisdiction is not denied by any act of Congress, and he can exercise no jurisdiction that is not expressly given him by the President's instructions.

In conclusion, we will add, there are technical objections to the plea filed in this case. In a plea to the jurisdiction of this court, it is necessary to show that there is another court in which effectual justice may be administered; the plea under consideration wants that requisite, which alone ought to be sufficient to warrant this court in taking jurisdiction, lest there might be a failure of justice. We are perfectly satisfied that this court have jurisdiction, and therefore overrule the plea, and order the defendant to proceed to show cause, if any he has, why the decree of Don Jose Calava, late Governor of West Florida, should not be carried into execution.

THE HEIRS OF VIDAL vs. JOHN INNERARITY :

The defendant in this case, on the rule to show cause, filed several reasons why the decree, as prayed for, should not be carried into effect. These reasons have been ably argued both on the side of the defendant and the petitioners.

It now becomes the duty of the court to pronounce its decree; but, before doing so, we will endeavor to give a succinct statement of all the proceedings in the case.

We find, on the records of the judicial tribunal to which this court has succeeded, a decree, which does not appear ever to have been complied with. The duty of a judge to carry into effect the decrees of his predecessor is clearly pointed out by the partidas. It is true this cannot be called a final decision or judgment of the matter in dispute between the parties; yet, as far as it goes, it is res judicata, (or thing judged by the competent tribunal,) and remains only to be carried into effect, although, after being carried into effect, something may still remain to be done before a final close to the proceedings. The decree must either be executed or rescinded; the latter can only take place after examining the grounds on which it was entered up; and that we have a right to do this, we think at least doubtful, and certainly would not, unless gross injustice or contradiction appeared on the face of the decree itself. If a decree wanting those substantial requisites known to all laws should be made, it would be a nullity: as if pronounced without a citation to the defendant, or his being before the court, such would be looked upon as no decree. And all decrees can be set aside on the ground of fraud, or where corruption is shown in obtaining them. But where the decree stands unrescinded, it must be executed. Such, also, is the English law of equity: a decree must be first obeyed and performed; as if it be for land, the land must be first given up; if it be for money, the money must be paid; if for evidences, the evidence must be brought in; and the like in other cases. (Cooper's Equity, page 90.)

The decree under consideration embraces three distinct subjects:

1st. The deposit admitted to have been intrusted to the house of Forbes & Co., which the defendant represents; and this deposite is declared by the decree not to have been legally and regularly accounted for.

2d. The land at Baton Rouge, sold at the instance of Forbes, and which the decree now declares to be left open between the parties as the subject-matter of a distinct suit.

3d. The sale of property at New Orleans; moneys said to have been received at Madrid and elsewhere, and not accounted for.

As to the first, it was a subject within the control of the court at any time; that is, to compel the restoration of the deposite, or to account for its disbursement. The law on this point is clear, taking it for granted that the deposite has been made, that the depository is, quoad hoc, under the control of the court. If it be notified to the depository that it is the will and pleasure of the court that the deposite be brought into court, it is all he can ask or require. It would be absurd to say that the court should institute a suit, make up the pleadings, join issue, &c. in such a case, and that, too, when the deposite was placed by the order of the court in the hands of the depository for safe-keeping, always subject to its order.

The court are of opinion that the certificate of the clerks of the office that the decree of the late court was made known to John Innerarity, the defendant, is sufficient evidence of the fact. Great stress was laid by the defendant's counsel on the circumstance that a part of the certificate is contradicted by inspection of the paper, viz: that the defendant has affixed his signature, as evidence of notice to him; when, in reality, he has not. But we say that the certificate ought not to be impeached on this ground, because it cannot deceive; and if they had in reality acted corruptly in office, they would not have certified that as a fact which the certificate itself disproves. The affixing the signature of the party notified does not appear to be an essential formality, and is more frequently dispensed with than required. The substance is notice to the party; and this we think is sufficiently proved by the certificate of the clerks. As respects the decree to make the deposite, we think the defendant had sufficient notice. That part of the decree relative to the land, from its nature, is not before the court; it amounts to nothing more than declaring the subject open for the parties to prosecute their claims according to law.

The second is merely a decree to account to the court for property belonging to the estate sold in New Orleans and elsewhere. The decree to account is, in most instances, granted as of course. It follows the plaintiff's petition, and we can see nothing irregular in giving the defendant notice of both at the same time, particularly as no injury could result to him from this course.

Again: even supposing all these formalities necessary, taking into view all the circumstances of the case, it is an act of comity due from one court to another to presume that all the necessary preliminary steps were taken before the decree was made, unless the contrary be made most clearly to appear, which the defendant has failed to do in this case. Knowing that, even where citations are necessary, it is a principle of law that appearance will do away the necessity of process, or cure all its defects, it is a violent presumption to suppose he did appear? We think not; and the law, by which the court is bound, would clearly presume the fact. The petition before the court would, of itself, be sufficient to ground a decree similar to the one which is prayed to be enforced. It is not alleged that an account has been rendered of the property seized, and sold by Forbes & Co., in New Orleans; and it appears by a former decree that Forbes was expressly ordered to raise the attachment he had laid on the property, and proceed to make sale of it, and render an account. But, independently of this view of this subject, we conceive that the defendant was before the court as a party interested in the settlement of the estate of Vidal. This is not the case of a lawsuit between A and B; the subject is the complete and final adjustment of the estate of a deceased person, to affect the interest of all in any way concerned, to wit, the creditors, heirs, executors, administrators, and depository. According to the Spanish law, as well as the law of equity in the United States and England, the court will not suffer the matter to go out of their hands, and be finally at rest, until complete justice be done to all concerned.

The affairs of the estate do not appear to have been finally closed when the first petitions were presented by the heirs. Although the petitions of Caroline and Mercedes Vidal had, in the first instance, nothing in view but to coerce the production of the papers relative to the estate in the hands of the defendant, yet the object was evidently to compel him to account, if, on examination of the papers, there should be any thing due them; and, in one of the petitions presented for the production of the papers, interrogatories are put to John Innerarity, the defendant, touching the very matters for which the decrees following the petitions, subsequent to their production, are rendered. To these interrogatories the defendant puts in a plea, in the nature of a demurrer, and his counsel has taken great pains to show he was not bound to answer them. This is not the question. It is, whether, by appearing, he is not to be considered as before the court in the particular demand of the heirs, as well as in the testamentary proceedings in general.

The defendant's inexplicable conduct in keeping back the papers, and producing them at last on compulsion, with the excuse that they were discovered by a "most extraordinary accident," does not incline the court to make any very violent presumption in his favor.

The defendant is in the situation of a party brought before a court of chancery on a bill of discovery; being once before the court, justice will be done the parties on a view of the facts disclosed. In the Spanish courts, as well as in our courts of equity, the remedy does not exclusively follow; but the court will give such relief, and make such decree, as the nature of the case and justice may require. Again: we are of opinion that the court could order or decree that the depositary should bring the deposit into court, without being cited to hear the dictamen ordering him to do so, and could inform him of it in any manner the court thought proper. It is also our opinion that the decree to account for the proceeds of the property intrusted to him by the court is ex parte, and did not require a citation to hear it, as, in the matters under consideration, he was acting in a trust confided to him by the court, and is in that respect to be considered and viewed in the light of an officer of the court.

The court, for its own satisfaction, has compared the decree before them with the testamentary proceedings to which it refers, and are satisfied that the judge's dictamen is, in the main, fully supported. That the testamentary proceedings have been irregular, is self-evident; a complete inventory of the whole estate was never made. Three of the creditors, of whom Forbes was the principal, administered on the property found in this place, and afterwards, on the order of the court, handed it over to the executor, who made sale of the same. No inventory or appraisal appears ever to have been made of the real estate, and nothing but a loose and imperfect one was made of the effects in New Orleans.

The land was seized and sold under a mortgage made to Arroyo, in a manner so evidently irregular that we would be warranted in saying that it was fraudulent. The same tribunal, a year afterwards, annulled the sale, and ordered the property to be sold a second time. By a decree of Don Jose Callava, late Governor of this province, the second sale is declared void and illegal; and by the dictamen now under the consideration of the court, the subject is again opened, and Forbes and others are permitted to make defence.

The proceeds of the sales of personal property were drawn from the hands of Annas, the executor, on the petition of Forbes, and placed in the public treasury; and afterwards, on application of Forbes, drawn out of the treasury, and placed in the hands of Forbes & Co. in the character of a deposit.

The second sale of the real property at Baton Rouge was ordered at a meeting of the creditors, of which Forbes appears to have been principal; and the money in deposit is said to have been appropriated, on an order of the court, to the payment of the debt due Arroyo, for which the lands were sold in the first instance; and the proceeds of the second sale were placed in the hands of Forbes & Co. as a deposit.

The decree on which we are now acting, whether it be considered as relating to the first or second deposit, declares that the disbursement of the sum deposited has not been accounted for in a satisfactory manner.

The Spanish tribunal has thought proper to review the whole of the proceedings in the testamentary affairs of Vidal. We take it for granted it had a right to do so. Whether this court would have acted in this manner, or proceeded in a different way, is not the question. The court will take up the record as they find it, and, unless the dictamen is glaringly unjust on the face of it, or void of all the essential formalities, it must be substantially enforced.

The testamentary affairs were not closed; and we find, from every part of the proceedings, the former tribunal considered itself at liberty to retrace its steps when supposed to be in error. But when decrees are made, they must be executed; for it cannot be supposed that a court could be guilty of so much levity as to make them to-day, only to be rescinded to-morrow. From the pains evidently taken by the judge in examining the grounds and making up his decree, it cannot be presumed, as intimated by the defendant's counsel, that he intended merely to amuse the plaintiffs, and that the approbation and signature of the Governor were obtained by legerdemain; this would cast a most gross imputation on the tribunals to which we have succeeded. The present case is one where the former tribunals have reviewed their own decrees; and is it for us to say that they had no right to do so, especially when we find that the same thing has been done in various instances in the progress of this testamentary proceeding? Although we might consider ourselves restrained from reviewing and re-examining their decrees, (except on the grounds before stated,) yet this is very different from saying they have no right to correct their own proceedings. We find them in the present case thus corrected, and are called upon to execute the last dictamen. We will do so substantially.

Therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court, that John Innerarity, the defendant, produce exact accounts, supported by legal documents, within twenty days from this day, according to the decree of Suares and Callava, dated Pensacola, 30th of June, and 1st of July, 1820, before such auditors as this court shall appoint. And it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said Innerarity hypothecate, before the notary public of Pensacola, unencumbered real property situate in the city of Pensacola, to be valued at $8,500, within five days from this time, to secure the deposit and interest thereon, for the purpose of satisfying any final decree this court may pass against him on account of said deposit. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that, in case the said Innerarity should fail to comply in giving the security ordered on the sixth day, the petitioners may have execution for the sum of $8,500. Said execution is first to run against the personal property of the said Innerarity; after that is exhausted, his body may be taken in execution.

And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said sum, or such part of it as may be made, shall be brought into court, and be subject to its further order; and that the execution be returnable in thirty days from the day it issues. And, lastly, it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the heirs of Vidal may prosecute their claims relative to the 16,000 acres of land, as authorized in the dictamen of Suares of the Secretary of State to Governor Jackson.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 26, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of 30th July, 26th August, and 1st September, with their respective enclosures, which have been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States.

I now enclose a copy of a letter which I have, by his direction, written to Judge Fromentin, informing him that it was intended that his jurisdiction should be confined to the execution of the only laws of the United States which, by act of Congress, had been extended to the territories of Florida, namely: the laws relating to the revenue and its collection, and to the slave trade. In the execution of these laws, which are of a nature entirely distinct from those of Spain, operating in the provinces, the President is of opinion that he should be amenable only to the Government of the United States.

I enclose, also, translations of a letter from Mr. Salmon, Chargé des Affaires of Spain, and of a statement by Colonel Callava, relative to the arrest and detention of his person, and of the forcible seizure and abduction, under your authority, of certain papers which were in his possession, with a copy of the answer given to the letter of Mr. Salmon. Before an ultimate answer shall be given to the Spanish Minister upon this complaint, the President has thought it proper to transmit these documents to you, with the purpose of receiving any remarks, either in relation to the facts alleged, or to the principles asserted in them, which you may think the occasion requires.

Appreciating, as the President does, the sense of duty under which you felt yourself compelled to resort to these measures, and the objects of high and impartial justice to which they were in your estimation rendered indispensable, I am directed particularly to invite your attention to the following circumstances represented in these papers:

1. That Colonel Callava claimed as of right the immunities, with reference to his person, to his dwelling-house, and to his papers, which, by the customary laws of nations, belong to public commissioners appointed to negotiate or to execute treaty stipulations between nation and nation.

2. That you had transacted business with him in the capacity of a public commissioner as late as the 3d of August, three weeks after the day on which the surrender had been made of the territory.

3. That the papers finally seized by your orders had never been officially demanded, and that he had offered to deliver them, or give adequate security that they should be delivered, if they should prove to be of the description of papers stipulated by the treaty to be left in the territory.

4. That, at the time when he was forcibly brought before you, and required to submit to examination upon interrogatories, neither the questions asked of him, nor his answers, were correctly interpreted.

It is proper to apprise you that, in the opinion of the President, so far as Colonel Callava could justly claim the rights of a commissioner for the surrender of the territory, he was entitled to all the immunities which might be necessary for the execution of his trust, and which the laws of nations recognise as belonging to public ministers. As authority for this opinion, I refer you to Vattel, book 4, ch. 6, § 75, and ch. 9, § 125.

A different sentiment appearing, from your letter of the 26th August, to have been entertained by you, it would be satisfactory to learn upon what grounds it had been taken up; or, if the privileges incident to this immunity had in your view ceased, it is desirable to know the considerations upon which you had so deemed of them; the view taken of them in the answer to the note of Mr. Salmon admitting the right only in general terms, and inferring that they had ceased by the act of surrender, and of reasonable time for departure, as well as by the limitation of the time for the surrender stipulated in the treaty.

I shall reply as early as possible to the other subjects of your letter; and, in the mean while, have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ANDREW JACKSON, Esq.,
Governor of Florida.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, November 13, 1821.

SIR: I arrived at this place on the 5th instant, and have deferred writing you until the present moment, indulging the expectation that I should in the mean time have received some communications of interest from the Floridas; in this calculation, however, I have been disappointed, in consequence of the irregularity of the mails between this and that place. There has been no arrival, bringing any thing of a later date than that of my departure from Pensacola.

From the National Intelligencer I have discovered that a publication has appeared in the Charleston Patriot, purporting to give the substance of a correspondence between Judge Fromentin and myself, with accompanying strictures upon the same; and stating that "detailed accounts of the whole affair," with copies of said papers, had been transmitted to Washington; that they "have been confided to individuals, and are circulated privately." On referring to my former communications, I do not find that a copy of that correspondence has been forwarded to the Department of State; and believing, as I do, from Judge Fromentin's disregard to truth, that he has secretly circulated it, without the accompanying certificates, for the purpose, if possible, of forestalling public opinion, I herewith enclose copies of all the documents touching the transaction, with a request that they may be laid before the President, and, should it be deemed necessary, to be communicated for the information of the Congress of the United States. This exposé furnishes a satisfactory view of the whole ground in dispute, and incontestably proves that Judge Fromentin has been guilty of wilfully and wickedly fabricating the most palpable falsehoods. The evidence of such unblushing depravity and corruption should be placed in the possession of the President, and, in strict justice, deserves to be exposed to the execration of the whole American people. When an officer of such high responsibility under the Federal Government manifests such baseness and obliquity of heart, it ought to excite our alarm, and stimulate the proper authority to apply the most speedy and efficient remedy.

When Judge Fromentin appeared before me, in obedience to the citation served upon him, and made what I conceived to be a sufficient apology for interfering with my jurisdiction, by issuing the writ of habeas corpus, and having explicitly and positively promised that he would not again do any act to impede the exercise of my prerogative, I was perfectly willing that the affair should here be put to rest, and, if possible, be buried in oblivion. With this view alone, I barely required his signature to so much of the proceedings between us as was absolutely necessary for my own justification, and to show that he had granted the writ without petition or affidavit, agreeably to law, and that he did not recollect to whom or to which of the applicants it had been delivered!

Although the judge, in the publication referred to, asserts that our interview and its results were the topics of conversation in the town of Pensacola for a week after they transpired, I can confidently state that they never did become the subject of remark where I was present, except on the evening subsequent to his discharge. On that occasion there appeared to be a universal concurrence of opinion that the judge's apology, as made in the presence of several respectable gentlemen, was a correct and prudent measure on his part, and that it was an act of lenity and forbearance on mine, in thus terminating this hasty and indecorous attempt to embarrass the administration of justice; inasmuch as the instructions and duty of the judge enjoined it upon him to co-operate with me in the administration of the Government, and in distributing justice equally to all. A general surprise was also expressed at the circumstance of his sympathies being exclusively enlisted for the relief of Colonel Callava! With respect to poor Domingo Sousa, and Fullarat, the steward, the law was to be permitted to take its course, and, although the servile instruments of Callava, they were to be left to their fate! For them, Judge Fromentin seems to have had no bowels of compassion. They might have perished, and rotted in prison, before he would have stepped forward, with the sanction of his authority, for their deliverance. The fact was, they had no wealth or influence, and the judge was not, consequently, clothed with the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus for their relief. Agreeably to his principles, the laws of the United States are only made for the punishment of the humble and pennyless; but, whenever opposed to wealth and power, they must either remain inoperative, or, if enforced, it must be done with great delicacy and respect. This course of proceeding may very well comport with the corrupt and inquisitorial system of former Spanish tribunals, but they are clearly and palpably unjust, and merit the unqualified reprobation of every honest and intelligent American. I can assure you that, so far as I have been enabled to collect an expression of public sentiment relative to the conduct of Judge Fromentin, it has evidently rendered him so odious and contemptible, that his name is only mentioned in genteel circles to be deprecated and despised. It is considered so flagrant and flagitious a departure from justice and propriety, as seriously to impair his standing, and rather to produce disaffection than inspire respect and confidence in the American authorities in Florida.

Situated as Judge Fromentin was, I did not anticipate that he would have had the hardihood and temerity to revive this transaction, and make it a subject of public investigation. Good sense, as well as the best policy, would certainly have dictated a very different procedure. After his concessions and open acknowledgments that he had acted hastily, and without a due consideration of the case, it could not have been expected that the most abandoned and profligate would have denied the facts, particularly when those declarations were made in the presence of several gentlemen of the most unimpeachable integrity. The man who could thus prostitute his signature for the propagation of such glaring and barefaced falsehoods, evinces an effrontery almost without a parallel, and a destitution of principle very incompatible with the character of one selected to administer the laws as judge of the United States. Elevated as he was, I had hoped that I should meet with a manly feeling and lofty integrity corresponding with his honorable station; but I sincerely regret to say that he has displayed a want of honesty and candor only becoming an apostate priest, and which is enough to suffuse the cheek of depravity itself with a blush. I may, perhaps, express my indignation upon this subject with too much freedom. If the language is harsh, I am willing to acknowledge that it does not altogether become me, but I am not convinced that it is not merited in its application.

Upon a perusal of the whole correspondence and accompanying documents, and after a mature consideration of the subject, I am induced to believe that the President will be entirely satisfied of Judge Fromentin's having acted regardless of principle and duty, and that he is altogether unworthy of the confidence reposed in him as a judicial officer of the United States. To communicate the testimony necessary to establish this fact, I have been impelled by the imperative obligations which I feel myself bound to discharge in justice to myself and our common country.

With every assurance of respect and esteem, I am, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

P. S. Doctor Bronaugh will hand you several depositions and reports in the case of Callava, which I have forwarded in addition to those heretofore transmitted upon the same subject. It is my desire that they should be submitted to the President, and, if called for, to be laid before Congress. Altogether, they demonstrate the falsehood of Callava's statement, and show how little regard he had to truth in making it.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Judge Fromentin to Governor Jackson.

PENSACOLA, September 3, 1821.

SIR: I am informed that it is rumored in town that, in the interview between your Excellency and myself, in the afternoon of the 24th ultimo, I had apologized to your Excellency for issuing a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava. I hope your Excellency will not hesitate in enabling me effectually to contradict that report.

Your Excellency cannot have forgotten that, from the beginning to the end of the conversation, I insisted, not only on the right, but on the duty of a judge of the United States to grant that writ; and that, among other things, upon being questioned by your Excellency whether I would order a writ of habeas corpus to be served upon the Captain General of the island of Cuba, I told you no; but that I would not hesitate, if the case should require it, and if I had the necessary jurisdiction, to issue one to be served on the President of the United States. To this you answered, that the President was only liable to impeachment; I added that I was confident that, in my place, you would have issued a writ of habeas corpus.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

Judge of the U. S., &c.

Governor Jackson to Judge Fromentin.

PENSACOLA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS,
September 3, 1821.

SIR: Your note, by Mr. Scott, has just been handed to me; and I am truly astonished at its contents, and, in answer, state, that when you appeared before me in the Executive Chamber on the 24th ultimo, you did then and there state, and acknowledge, that you had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without proper information as to the facts of the case, upon the importunities of John Innerarity and some other Spanish gentlemen; and that, had you been apprized that Colonel Callava had been committed by me for contempt of my authority, you certainly would not have interfered; and you further acknowledged that you had called upon me several times in a friendly way to advise with me as to your jurisdiction, and that I had always told you that it was my opinion you had no other jurisdiction, except as far as the laws of the United States had, by the act of Congress, been extended over these provinces; and that, when I showed you the powers which had been granted to me by the President of the United States, you declared that there was no necessity for your being here, and that you might as well return to New Orleans; and that I replied that you had jurisdiction over the revenue and the infraction of the laws of Congress prohibiting the importation of slaves. And you did then declare that, hereafter, you would in no way attempt to interfere with my authority.

There was likewise some conversation in relation to the powers of a judge of the United States to issue a writ of habeas corpus in the States, except in particular cases; and I stated to you that, if you were in the States, you would have no right to interfere in the manner which you had attempted here, and referred you to the laws of Congress. If this, sir, was not an apology, I know not what is. I received it as such, and dismissed you accordingly, under the citation by which you were brought before me to show cause, &c.

I am, sir, with due respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Governor of the Floridas, &c.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN, Judge, &c.

No. 3.

Judge Fromentin to General Jackson.

PENSACOLA, Sept. 3, 1821.

SIR: If your Excellency has been astonished at my letter, I may assure your Excellency that I have been not less so at reading your answer. I "acknowledge that I had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without proper information as to the facts of the case, upon the importunities of John Innerarity and some other Spanish gentlemen; and that, had I been apprized that Colonel Callava had been committed by you for contempt of your authority, I certainly would not have interfered!" Never, sir, never! My blood recoils at such a statement. Its last drop will flow before I subscribe to it.

Give me leave, sir, to put your Excellency in mind that you began the conversation, and I could scarcely find time to place a word; nor did you hear me mention Mr. Innerarity's name, nor any other name, until your Excellency asked me who were the persons that had applied for the writ; and then I mentioned Mr. Innerarity's name, with the names of the other gentlemen who, jointly with him, had applied for it. The conversation then turned on the verbal application for the writ, when Doctor Bronaugh entered, and reduced that part of it to writing. The extent of your powers was the next topic, and you read the act of Congress, and began to read one of your commissions. But neither then, nor at any time before, did your Excellency favor me with an entire perusal of your several commissions.

On that occasion, as on every other preceding occasion, when our respective powers and duties were the subject of conversation, you insisted on my being confined to the two cases stated by your Excellency; and, as that had already been referred to the President, it was unnecessary for me to insist.

It is most assuredly true that I said that I never had, nor ever would interfere with your authority; nor indeed, sir, the authority of any other man. But, sir, does it follow that I am disposed to surrender the authority vested in me? Assuredly not. Legal authority is one thing; illegal authority is another thing. Upon that we differ. A higher tribunal than yours or mine must of course pronounce. I have the honor to be, &c.

Governor Jackson to Judge Fromentin.

SIR: I have this moment received your second note of this day. The first excited my astonishment, it is true; but the second my indignation and contempt; for I did not suppose, until your note now before me furnished conclusive evidence, that you were capable of stating a wilful and deliberate falsehood. That you have done so in your note of this evening, I do assert, as the enclosed certificates of Dr. J. C. Bronaugh (who was directed by me to pay particular attention to our conversation) and Mr. Rutledge fully prove. That you have the hardihood to deny that, when you called at my house, I did not send for my book to the office containing the record of my commissions and instructions, and that I did not read the whole of them to you, shows that you are regardless of truth; and in this I do pronounce that you have stated another deliberate falsehood.

I have barely to add, that I recommend to you to keep within your legal jurisdiction and powers. Whilst you do this, all your proceedings will be supported, and all my aid given that may be necessary to carry them into effect; but when you attempt to transcend them, and interfere with my legitimate powers, recollect the admonition I gave you when before me on the 24th ultimo, and attend to it, or you will be treated and punished as you deserve, regardless of your boasts of blood flowing, &c., which pass by me as the fleeting breeze.

Here, sir, on this subject, our communication closes, as I am too much engaged to read yours.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

A. JACKSON.

PENSACOLA, September 3, 1821.

SIR: Agreeably to your request, I have the honor to state that I was present when the conversation took place between Judge Fromentin and yourself on the 24th ultimo, on the subject of his having issued a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava, and that I paid the most particular attention to every thing which occurred on that occasion, and that you have correctly stated the substance of that conversation in a letter of this date, which I copied, addressed to Judge Fromentin.

After some remarks made by you in relation to his improper and indecorous interference in a case where your authority was attempted to be set at defiance, and that, too, by force of arms, and while sitting in your judicial capacity treated with contempt, Judge Fromentin did acknowledge that he had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without a proper knowledge of the facts, and that he had issued the writ of habeas corpus, having been urged to it by a number of individuals; and, being requested to name them, mentioned Innerarity, La Rua, Brosnaham, and some others; and declared that, had he been informed that you had committed Colonel Callava for contempt of your authority, while sitting in your judicial capacity, the writ of habeas corpus would not have been issued; and that, for the future, he should in no way attempt to interfere with your authority and powers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

PENSACOLA, September 3, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with your request that I would explain to you my understanding of that part of the conversation which took place between your Excellency and Judge Fromentin, upon the appearance of the latter before you, agreeably to citation, on the 24th ultimo, relative to these points: whether Judge Fromentin did or did not say that, had he been aware of the circumstances of Colonel Callava's commitment, he would not have issued the writ of habeas corpus in his favor, as he had done; and whether he did or did not declare that, in the future exercise of his functions, he would carefully avoid interfering with the lawful subjects of your Excellency's jurisdiction, I have the honor to state as follows: that I was present during the whole of the conversation; and, although neither a retentive memory, nor particular attention paid at the time to the words used by Judge Fromentin, warrant me in referring to them, yet the impression which remains upon my mind, from the conversation above mentioned, is clearly this: that Judge Fromentin, after hearing the act of Congress, one of your Excellency's commissions, and some other documents, read, endeavored, by adducing the peculiar circumstances under which the writ had been issued, to offer something equivalent to an apology for the course he had pursued, and gave your Excellency distinctly to understand that he was determined not to interfere in future with any of the branches of your administration.

I have the honor to be, &c.

E. A. RUTLEDGE.

HIS EX'CY ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

No. 8.

NASHVILLE, November 12, 1821.

I certify that I was present when Eligius Fromentin, shortly after he had received his commission as judge in West Florida, called upon Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, &c., with the view of consulting with him (as he stated) upon the nature and extent of the powers with which he (Fromentin) was clothed as judge of the United States. He expressed himself as being absolutely at a loss to discover what duties he had to perform, and desired that Governor Jackson would candidly advise him as to the course he ought to pursue. The Governor, in plain and friendly language, told him that the only United States laws extended to the Floridas by the act of Congress were the laws regulating the revenue and prohibiting the importation of slaves, and that he therefore believed his jurisdiction could reach no further than to cases arising under those laws. The Governor further told him that, if he could gather any light on the subject from a perusal of his commissions and instructions, they were at his service for perusal; and that, as the executive clerk was then busily engaged, if he would call on some future occasion, he would read him all his powers.

After this conversation Judge Fromentin retired, and accordingly called the next morning, Governor Jackson was at that time engaged, not in his house. The judge retired, and about one o'clock of the same day returned. After some conversation of the same purport with that before stated, the Governor requested me to go for the record book containing his commissions and letters of instructions. I returned with Mr. Connor, the executive clerk, who brought and handed the book to the Governor. The Governor then read his commissions and letters of instructions, and handed the same to Judge Fromentin, with permission to read.

The three commissions given by the President of the United States to Governor Jackson, and containing all his powers and instructions, were before Judge Fromentin, who, after expressing his satisfaction, having read, closed, and returned them, with some remarks which left no doubt upon my mind of his entire concurrence with the view taken of the subject by the Governor, left the room, saying that he "had as well be off to Orleans," there being little for him to do, or words to that effect.

The above detail gives only the substance of the conversation between the individuals named; the undersigned does not certify that he has given the precise language used by them.

OFFICE OF EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
Pensacola, August 23, 1821.

Present: His Excellency the Governor.

The order for the discharge of Colonel Don Jose Callava, Domingo Sousa, and Antoine Fullarat, being under the consideration of his Excellency, the same being written, but not issued, Captain Wager, the officer of the day, presented to his Excellency the following communication, viz:

PENSACOLA, W. F. August 24, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the within paper from Judge Fromentin was handed to and served upon me as officer of the guard stationed at the calaboose on the 23d instant, by a person who I have reason to believe was Dr. Brosnaham, of this place, who stated that he served it as a friend, and who, on being informed that no notice would be taken of the within paper, retired.

Very respectfully, &c.

G. W. MOUNTZ,
Lieut. 4th U. S. Infantry.

HIS EX'CY ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

The within paper was handed, immediately on its receipt, to Captain Wager, officer of the day.

G. W. MOUNTZ,
Lieut. 4th U. S. Infantry.

The United States to Lieutenant G. W. Mountz, of the 4th regiment U. S. infantry, greeting:

You are hereby commanded that you forthwith have the body of Jose Callava, late Governor of the province of West Florida, now in your custody, as is said, together with the day and cause of his caption and detention, by whatever name he may be known, before the judge of the court of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape, at his chambers in the city of Pensacola, to do, receive, and submit to whatever the said judge shall consider in that behalf; and have you then and there this writ, with your doings thereon.

Witness, Eligius Fromentin, judge of our said court, this twenty-third day of August, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-one.

I allow this writ:

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN,

Judge of the United States, &c.

Whereupon, it was ordered by his Excellency the Governor that Captain Wager report to Mr. Fromentin that the prisoners were confined for an open contempt of his Excellency's orders and decrees, and that he would keep them confined, agreeably thereto, until released by his Excellency's orders. And his Excellency the Governor issued the following further order, viz:

Eligius Fromentin, Esq. will, forthwith, be and appear before me to show cause why he has attempted to interfere with my authority as Governor of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and Intendant of the island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of said provinces, respectively, in my judicial capacity as supreme judge over the same, and as chancellor thereof; having committed certain individuals charged with a combination to secrete, and with having attempted to secrete and carry out of the territories ceded to the United States the evidence of individual right to property within the said territories, which has been secured to each individual under the second article of the late treaty with Spain, and in open contempt of the orders and decrees made by me; and that the said Eligius Fromentin, Esq., be, and appear before me at my office, at five o'clock, P. M., in Pensacola, to make known the above cause, and to abide by and perform such order and decree as the undersigned may of right deem proper to make of and concerning the same.

Given under my hand, at Pensacola, this twenty-third day of August, 1821.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Governor of the Floridas, &c.

To Colonel GEORGE WALTON, Secretary of West Florida, to make known and execute the above, and to furnish a copy of the above, if required, returning this original, and in writing make known how he has executed the same.

Under which order Colonel Walton made the following return, viz:

By virtue of the above order, I have summoned Eligius Fromentin, Esq., personally to appear at the office of his Excellency Major General Andrew Jackson at five o'clock this afternoon, and, at his request, have furnished the said Eligius Fromentin with a copy of the order, certified under my hand as Secretary of West Florida; and the said Eligius Fromentin, in answer to the said summons, declared his perfect willingness to obey this and every other order of his Excellency the Governor; but asserts that he is unable, through indisposition, to attend this afternoon, as above he is required.

GEORGE WALTON,

Secretary of West Florida.

Whereupon, it is ordered by his Excellency that further time, till to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock, be given to the said Eligius Fromentin to appear and show cause as above he is required.

OFFICE OF EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,

Pensacola, August 24, 1821.

In obedience to the orders of his Excellency the Governor, Judge Fromentin appears and acknowledges that he granted the writ of habeas corpus without the affidavit of any person, and that it was granted upon the verbal application of a number of individuals; and, upon being questioned as to the individuals who made the application, named La Rua, Innerarity, Brosnaham, and Father Coleman. Upon being asked to whom he delivered the writ to be served upon the officer who had in custody Colonel Callava, he replied that he delivered it to one of the persons who made application for it, but to which he does not know.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN.

NOTE.—The word verbal interlined in the original by Judge Fromentin.

Whereupon it was ordered by his Excellency that the said Eligius Fromentin be dismissed without day, &c.

V.—Papers left at the Department of State by Dr. Bronaugh.

No. 1.

Lieutenant Mountz to Governor Jackson,

PENSACOLA, September 24, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with your order of the 22d instant, I have the honor to make the following detail of facts which transpired on the night of the 22d of August ultimo, all of which came under my immediate observation: About seven o'clock on the evening above mentioned, I was detailed to take command of a guard of twenty men, with orders to report to your Excellency, which I accordingly did; and, after receiving written instructions from you, proceeded, in company with Colonel Butler, Dr. Bronaugh, and Judge Brackenridge, to the house of Colonel Callava, the late Spanish Governor. On my arrival at the outer gate of his residence, I brought my guard to a halt; admittance was demanded by some one of the gentlemen above named, but no response was made; upon which the bolt or latch was removed, and we entered. When we reached the dwelling, admission was again asked for, in the name of the Governor; but no reply was made from within. A few minutes after this reiteration, some one stated that entrance might be gained at the other side of the house. I then marched my guard round, and took post in front of the house; Colonel Butler, &c., also went round and ascended the stairs to the piazza, where a number of persons were sitting. The darkness of the night prevented me from distinguishing who or what they were, there being no light, apparently, in the house. After a candle was procured, I was ordered, with my guard, into the house. Colonel Butler soon after informed me that Colonel Callava refused to deliver up the papers which your Excellency demanded of him, and requested me to put the orders I had received into immediate execution. I accordingly told Colonel Callava, through Judge Brackenridge, that his refusal to comply with the aforesaid demand compelled me to consider him my prisoner. He replied, through the same organ, that he would go with me as a prisoner, but represented that he was very unwell, and that I would be accountable for taking him from his sick bed at that time of night. I rejoined that I had no discretion on the subject, being in the discharge of my official duties. He then dressed himself, and, after proffering me his sword and cane, (which I refused,) proceeded with me to your Excellency's office, where I delivered him up. Before leaving the house, a corporal and three men were left, by order of Colonel Butler, to prevent any person from passing in or through the house. After the fulfilment of your Excellency's order to convey Colonel Callava to the calaboose, the guard under my command was dismissed. Nothing indecorous or improper, on the part of the guard, or of any of the gentlemen commissioned by you, or of other persons, took place during the evening, to the best of my knowledge.

With respect to the occurrences of the succeeding day, (23d,) I have to state that I was officer of the guard, at the calaboose, on that day; and that, on the receipt of the order to release Colonel Callava, I handed it to his secretary, who, after conveying the contents to Colonel Callava, said that he wished Judge Fromentin to be sent for, in order that he might accompany him to his house, (for what purpose I know not.) He was told that the Judge was sick, and could not come, but that some justice of the peace would answer as well. What reply he made to this, I am not able to say; he soon after left the prison in company with the officer of the day and a number of Spanish officers.

This statement comprises all the information on the subject which I am possessed of.

Given at Pensacola, West Florida, this 24th day of September, 1821.

I am very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

G. W. MOUNTZ, Lieut. U. S. A.

Captain Dade to Governor Jackson.

PENSACOLA, WEST FLORIDA,
September 25, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with your request, made to me this morning through Colonel Walton, I have the honor to state, that, on the 22d ultimo, Domingo Sousa, a Spanish officer, was delivered to me, then the officer of the day, as a prisoner, by your Excellency, with written instructions to keep him in custody until he should produce, or cause to be produced and delivered, to the alcalde, certain documents and papers therein enumerated. That I went with Domingo Sousa to see Colonel Callava, in whose possession he said the papers were, and to whom he wished to apply for them. We found him at the house of Colonel G. M. Brooke, in company with Mr. Innerarity and several Spanish officers. He was informed that Domingo Sousa was a prisoner in my custody; the instructions given me were produced, and his secretary, Lieutenant Cruzat, explained them. Colonel Callava, having directed Domingo Sousa to put on the uniform and surrender himself prisoner, said, as well as I could understand from Lieutenant Cruzat, that he (Domingo Sousa) was an officer acting under his orders, and that any papers your Excellency might want must be required of him, as commissioner, when they should be delivered. I returned with Domingo Sousa to the Executive Office, and made report to your Excellency.

I am, respectfully, &c.,

F. L. DADE, Capt. 4th Infantry.

Affidavits of Scott and Mitchell.

On the evening of the 22d of August, 1821, Mr. Scott and myself were walking on the public square, and, hearing Lieutenant Jackson (adjutant of the fourth regiment) order twenty men to be paraded immediately, with twenty rounds of ball cartridges, we were induced to go up to him and inquire what was the matter. He informed us that he was ordered to have the men immediately before the Governor's house, to await his orders.

The soldiers were placed under the command of Lieutenant Mountz.

Mr. Scott and myself, after the men left the Governor's, followed them to Colonel Callava's; when the party arrived there, they found the gate fastened. It was opened by some one of the party—whom, we do not know. Some persons went up to the door, and shortly after the party were ordered up to the door of Callava's house, and admittance was demanded, after knocking very loud, but no answer was returned. Admittance was then demanded by authority of the Governor, (as we understood, in Spanish;) but not knowing the language, we cannot say any thing positive on this point; however, no answer was returned. Colonel Butler then ordered the door to be broken down; but, before the order was attempted to be executed, it was reported that the house was open on the other side; the party went round, and we saw on the portico several gentlemen dressed in Spanish uniform, with their side arms on. Colonel Butler asked in Spanish, through an interpreter, where Colonel Callava was; their answer, as translated into English, was, they did not know.

Candles were then ordered to be sent for; but, before they were brought, some of the party went into a room where a candle was burning, and brought it into what might be called the hall.

Colonel Butler then ordered Lieutenant Mountz to send up a party of his men with bayonets; they, with others, went into the room from which the candle was taken, and Colonel Callava made his appearance with his coat off.

Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh then stated, through the medium of an interpreter, (Judge Brackenridge,) that they came for the papers he had promised to deliver, and that they must have them, or take him before the Governor. Colonel Callava (as was interpreted) answered that they might murder him, but he would not leave his room alive; and as to the papers, they might break open the seals and boxes, and take them, but he would not give them up. Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh refused to take them in this way, not having authority to do so, (as they said;) but told Colonel Callava that he might consider himself in duress, and give them up, and they would receipt for them. Some time was consumed in persuading Colonel Callava to comply; but he refused.

Colonel Butler then requested Colonel Callava to go with him to the Governor, stating that he did not wish (as we understood) to have his person outraged, and that he might consider force as applied; but Colonel Callava still refused, (as we understood,) declaring that he would not leave his room alive (as it was interpreted.)

It is but justice here to remark, that every indulgence and consideration was extended to Colonel Callava that the nature of the case could justify.

Colonel Butler then ordered Lieutenant Mountz up into the room, and reported to him that Colonel Callava had refused to deliver up the papers. On receiving the report, Lieutenant Mountz told Colonel Callava he was his prisoner, and must go with him to the Governor. Colonel Callava put on his coat and went. We did not see any of the enclosures torn down, nor did we hear either of the gentlemen of the commission say they would send Colonel Callava to jail.

Continuation of the statement of Alexander Scott, Jun., and John C. Mitchell.

Colonel Callava went with the party to the Executive Chamber, where we found Governor Jackson sitting in his judicial capacity. Colonel Callava was received with every mark of respect. Immediately on his entrance, the Governor requested him to be seated, and informed him that he had received official information that certain papers relative to the rights of individuals to property in this Territory were seen in the possession of a certain Domingo Sousa, who had declared that he had delivered them into the hands of Fullarat, (his steward,) and that it was incompatible with the treaty between Spain and the United States for any one to withhold from the American authorities any papers relating to the property of individuals in this Territory, or words to that effect.

Colonel Callava requested permission to write an answer in Spanish, which was granted by the Governor. Whereupon, Colonel Callava began to protest against the powers of the Governor to call upon him in this way, asserting what he considered his privileges as a Spanish commissioner, &c., (as we understood from the interpreter.) Governor Jackson then declared he would not recognise him in any other light than that of a private individual; and required him to answer whether the papers alluded to were, or were not, in his possession. Colonel Callava then requested that his secretary might be permitted to write down his answer, which was granted. He again commenced dictating a protest to his secretary, as we understood from the interpreter. Governor Jackson immediately declared that such a course was inadmissible, and that he must answer positively whether or not the aforementioned papers were in his possession. Colonel Callava positively refused to answer unless permitted to do so in his own way.

The Governor was then about to commence the examination of Fullarat, when Colonel Callava (as we understood from the interpreter) objected to his being examined, on account of his minority; the Spanish law requiring a person to be twenty-five years of age before he is legalis homo; which objection was overruled, and Fullarat, on his examination, admitted that boxes containing the aforementioned papers were delivered to him by Sousa, and were then in Colonel Callava's house.

The Governor then stated to Colonel Callava that he would send an officer, with such other person as Colonel Callava might designate, to bring the boxes containing the aforesaid papers, and that they could be taken out in his presence; which, after being done, he would dismiss the whole of them. But Colonel Callava refused.

The Governor then committed Colonel Callava, Sousa, and Fullarat to the common jail.

It is not true, as stated, that the Governor snatched away papers out of the hands of Colonel Callava.

Affidavit of John Coppinger Connor.

In compliance with the request of Major General A. Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, &c., I proceed to give my statement of facts as they occurred on the evening of the 22d of August last.

Being at that period engaged in the office of the Governor, I was present when Domingo Sousa was brought before him to answer for a contempt of his orders, in refusing to deliver up certain papers which had been demanded of him; and, on being interrogated, he stated that the papers in question had been handed over by him about eleven o'clock that morning to Fullarat, the major domo of Colonel Callava, at the Colonel's house; that said papers related to property in this country and in Louisiana; and that the said papers were then in the house of Colonel Callava. The Governor told him that he would permit him to go to Callava's house, accompanied by Captain Dade, in whose custody he was, and that, if he procured and delivered the papers, he should be dismissed; otherwise, he must stand committed. He replied, that a Spanish officer could not be put in prison; when the Governor told him, with considerable warmth, that the papers he would have, and that he would commit Sousa, Callava, and all concerned, for seven years, or until the papers should be forthcoming. These occurrences took place in the forenoon of the 22d August.

I was not a witness to any thing which followed, until Colonel Callava was brought before the Governor, on the night of the 22d. About the hour of ten o'clock he appeared at the Executive Office, accompanied by his secretary, Mr. Cruzat, and several Spanish officers, in full uniform, with their side arms. A seat was handed to Colonel Callava opposite the Governor, who immediately informed him, through the interpreter, that he was brought before him on a charge of having in his possession certain papers which appertained to the rights of individuals, and which papers did of right belong to the office of the alcalde, and could not properly be held in the possession of any other person; and handed to Judge Brackenridge a written interrogatory to translate to Colonel Callava, which was in the following words: "Were, or were not, the papers mentioned in a schedule handed to you by H. M. Brackenridge, Esquire, alcalde for Pensacola, delivered at your house this day, by Domingo Sousa, to Antoine Fullarat, your major domo, &c.; if so, at what time of the day?" This question being put, Colonel Callava rose, looked at his watch, and for a moment addressed the audience; then (as was interpreted) asked permission to write his answer himself, which was granted; after writing two or three words, he asked that his secretary be allowed to write for him, his eyes being weak; which was granted. A gentleman near the Governor observed to him that Colonel Callava was dictating to his secretary a solemn protest against the whole proceedings as a violent measure, and stating that he was a commissioner, &c. He was stopped there, and told that such a course could not be permitted; that he was required to answer directly to the question put—yes or no. The Governor then asked Mr. Cruzat, the secretary, for the paper on which he had been writing, which was handed to him by Mr. C., (not violently snatched or wrested from him,) and the Governor passed it to the alcalde, the interpreter, to put the interrogatory again, and to demand an immediate and direct reply. But he positively refused to reply.

Fullarat was then interrogated, and fully corroborated the statement made in the morning by Sousa, and added that said papers were at that moment in the house of Callava.

The Governor, with considerable warmth, again demanded of Colonel Callava the delivery of the papers, stating, at the same time, that if he would acknowledge the papers to be in his possession, Fullarat and Sousa should be discharged. Colonel Callava objected to the testimony of Fullarat, saying he was a minor, and his servant; and, turning round, addressing the audience in a loud and earnest tone of voice, dwelt for some time on his right as commissioner, &c. When all this was explained to the Governor by the interpreter, he (the Governor) ordered that it should not be named again that he was a commissioner; that he was before the Governor as an individual charged with combining with others to secrete and carry away certain papers, which were the evidence of the right of property of individuals in this country, and which papers were alleged to have been stolen from the office of the alcalde, they having been missing from said office, and no receipt being on record there for them; that the papers he must and would have; and that, if Colonel Callava persisted in his refusal, it would be considered as a contempt of his authority sitting in his high judicial capacity, and that he must abide by the consequences which would result to him. The Governor several times cautioned and warned Colonel Callava of his situation, and called upon his friends who were present to explain it to him. All efforts having been unavailing, and Colonel Callava still persisting in his refusal either to deliver the papers or to answer the interrogatories, except in his own way and as commissioner, after about two hours were spent, the Governor using every exertion to obtain the papers, but in vain, the Governor filled up a blank commitment, which he had drawn in case of necessity, and Colonel Callava, Domingo Sousa, and Antoine Fullarat, were committed to the calaboose.

VI.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, November 22, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th of October, with its several enclosures; and, pursuant to your request, I herewith submit to you the consideration which influenced me in the measures taken in relation to Colonel Don Jose Callava.

By the 2d article of the treaty, Spain was bound to deliver over, with the territories, &c., all archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces; and, in the language of the treaty, "the said archives and documents shall be left with the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them."

On the 17th of July possession was delivered to me, by the Spanish commandant, Don Jose Callava, of the provinces, fortifications, &c., together with what he represented to be all the archives and public documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the soil, and which by the treaty he was bound to deliver.

On the 21st of August, I received a note from the alcalde of the city of Pensacola, in which he states, "I learn, from the most satisfactory evidence, that a number of documents relating to estates in this place, and to suits instituted here, are in the possession of an individual of the name of Domingo Sousa. These papers properly belong to this office, but were not included in the inventory delivered by the late Governor. Some of the circumstances attending the affair are of a peculiar nature; but as the necessity for obtaining possession of the documents is urgent, I must defer making a report respecting them to some other period. At present, I must request your Excellency to authorize some one to make a regular demand of the said documents, and to ascertain precisely what they are."

Upon this information, I immediately issued a commission to my secretary, Colonel George Walton, and associated with him Henry M. Brackenridge and John Miller, Esqrs., directing them to proceed to the house of said Domingo Sousa, and to make a demand of such documents as ought to have been delivered under the treaty.

The demand being made by the commissioners, pursuant to their instructions from me, they returned, and delivered to me, in answer thereto, a letter from the said Domingo Sousa, in which he admits there are in his possession certain papers boxed up, which had been delivered to him for safe keeping by Colonel Callava.

The first effort to obtain from Sousa the papers sought for having failed, the application and demand was reiterated by the same gentlemen, under my order. They say to him, "We do not claim any papers in your possession, or that of any other, relating to the military tribunals, or to the revenue of the Spanish Government; but we are certain that no individual, no matter what office he may have held under the Spanish Government, has any right to retain possession of archives and documents which relate directly to the sovereignty and property of this province, &c.; and we again make a positive demand of the papers mentioned in your note of yesterday, to wit, the documents in the case of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal and Eugene Sierra; also, a proceeding against Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville, and the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca. These papers are known to be in your possession, and we demand to know by whose authority, as no person has the right to authorize you to detain them."

Upon the second demand, the aforesaid commissioners reported to me that Domingo Sousa had exhibited to them certain boxes of papers for examination, and that, among them, were the papers before enumerated; papers by which the right of individuals (some of whom were orphans) to a property of great value in the Floridas could alone be established; papers which, being indispensable to the establishment of right and title to property in the Territory, ought to have been delivered over with the archives and public documents, as by the treaty Spain had stipulated, and the Spanish commandant was bound to do. Sousa, however, refused to deliver them, and returned them to the house and keeping of Colonel Callava, from whom he had received them. If the papers related to the property and sovereignty of the soil, Colonel Callava had no more right to detain them than had his subaltern Domingo Sousa. His functions having ceased by the delivery of the province, he stood, in relation to our Government, in the same capacity that any other private individual would have done. He owed the same obedience to the laws, and was subject to the same punishment for an infraction of them.

That I have never considered Colonel Callava as clothed with any diplomatic powers from the Government of Spain, is, as you have inferred from my letter, most certainly true; because he had not only never exhibited to me any credentials or testimonials vesting such powers in him, but, on the contrary, when I proposed to him a reciprocal exhibition of our respective authorities, he waived the ceremony. In a letter to me of the 19th of June, to which I refer you, he remarks: "I repeat the assurances I have made you in other communications, of my being furnished with orders, under the same treaty, to evacuate this province, and give possession of it to the commissioners or officers of the United States lawfully authorized to receive it." "Your Excellency expresses also a wish that I would concur in fixing a day, as early as possible, and to suit the mutual convenience of both parties, for an interview and exhibition of our credentials. In reply, I have the honor to acquaint your Excellency that in your quality of commissioner you may, when it suits your pleasure, and in the manner you may deem most expedient, exhibit your credentials to me as the existing commandant of the province. And I have already told your Excellency that I am authorized to enter into arrangement for its being evacuated by His Catholic Majesty's troops, and delivered to your Excellency, agreeably to the stipulations by our respective Governments."

From the foregoing extract, you will be convinced I never could have considered Colonel Callava as possessing any powers in regard to the treaty but such as he derived from the Captain General of the Island of Cuba, and, by virtue of his office of Governor of West Florida. Nor can you fail to draw the conclusion that Colonel Callava did not consider himself competent to the exercise of any other powers, duties, or privileges, under the treaty, than those enumerated in his letter to me, to wit, the evacuation of the province, and the surrender of it to the American authorities; and even these he did not claim to exercise as commissioner, but says "you may exhibit your credentials to me as the existing commandant of this province," in which capacity "I am authorized to enter into arrangements for its being evacuated by His Catholic Majesty's troops, and surrendered agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty." It had been reported to me by Colonel Forbes, the American agent charged with the delivery of the royal order to the Captain General of Cuba, that he had arrived at Pensacola on the 9th of June, accompanied by Don Alva, the Spanish commissioner for delivering the provinces of East and West Florida to the American authorities appointed to receive them. This information I communicated to Colonel Callava; and, for the considerations growing out of it, I proposed to him, as I have before stated to you, a reciprocal exhibition and recognition of our respective credentials. This he declined, as you have seen. I then plainly foresaw that he wished to draw me into a delay of the time for the delivery of the country; for, if I had refused to recognise him as the agent authorized by the Captain General of Cuba to make the transfer, I must either have submitted to a tedious, embarrassing, and injurious procrastination of the surrender of the provinces to the United States, or have been driven to the necessity of taking it by force. And as there was no express stipulation for a formal delivery, I deemed it better to receive the Territories of him, as the agent of Spain, acting under orders which he professed to have received, than to submit either to the delay which must otherwise have ensued, or to resort to force to obtain that for my Government which Spain was bound, by all good faith, under an existing treaty, to put into its possession amicably and without delay. Having viewed Colonel Callava, then, merely as an agent, invested with no other powers than a surrender of the province and a withdrawal of the Spanish forces, I regarded him, in the consummation of these duties, as entitled to all the privileges and immunities guaranteed to such agents by the laws of nations; but, sir, the moment the surrender was made, and the soil and sovereignty of the Territories became vested in the United States, my duties as commissioner ceased, and my functions as Governor commenced. He, too, having accomplished all that had been assigned him to do, was bound, by the express stipulations of the treaty, to have withdrawn himself from the ceded province. Neglecting so to do, no other privileges could appertain to him than such as attach to every individual.

"The faith of treaties," says Vattel, "is holy and sacred between nations, whose safety and repose it secures; and he who violates it, at the same time violates the laws of nations. And if the people are true to themselves, infamy will ever be the fate of him who violates his faith."

By the second article of the treaty which I have before quoted, all archives and documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the country ceded were to have been delivered with the Territories. I would ask, then, were not the papers which were secreted and attempted to be carried away (and which were the cause of his imprisonment) of the description contemplated, and expressly provided by the treaty to have been delivered? Did they not appertain to the private property of the ceded country? Were they not in themselves private property? If so, was not the attempt to carry them away not only a flagrant violation of the treaty, but a larceny upon the individuals whose property they were, and from whom he was clandestinely taking and carrying them off? And, sir, as a proof that the papers were of the description contemplated by the treaty to be left in the province, and that Colonel Callava intended to carry them out of the country, permit me here to make an extract from the deposition of Mercedes Vidal Palao, taken before Henry M. Brackenridge, Esq., alcalde of the city of Pensacola. She testified "that her father, Nicolas Maria Vidal, left her by his will one of his heirs, and that he died about the year 1806, possessed of a large real and personal estate; that the will of her father, with the inventories of his real and personal estate, has been for several years missing from the public archives of Pensacola, having been by some person unknown withdrawn from the same; that repeated applications were made by her to the authorities then existing there to compel the restoration of the said papers and documents, as they were, and still are, necessary to enable her to prosecute her said claim under the said will; that the said papers were finally restored under a decree." The deponent further states that, "a few days before the change of Government, she demanded them of Colonel Callava, who informed her that he could not give them up, as he was obliged to take them to Havana." The deponent further states that said papers relate to property in this country and Louisiana.

Inasmuch as treaties contain promises that are perfect and reciprocal, if one of the contracting parties fail in his engagements, the other may constrain him to fulfil them. If this is a clear principle of national law, the right to imprison the Spanish agent would not be in the least affected by the termination or continuation of his immunities as agent; nor will the right of the United States to compel Spain to a faithful execution of the treaty be disputed. If, then, Spain was liable so to be coerced, how much more is he subject to such compulsion who is merely her agent; an agent, too, in whom we are bound to believe she reposed the most implicit confidence; one to whom she had intrusted, and from whom she expected, a faithful and honorable discharge of the high obligations she had assumed with the United States?

I have thus, sir, gone through the principal considerations which governed me in the imprisonment of Colonel Callava, and have added a few of the facts that made this course indispensable; from all of which you will perceive that, in all my intercourse with him, I have viewed him in no other, nor could I view him in any other, light than that of military agent of Spain, appointed by the Captain General of Cuba to deliver over the province, and all things appertaining thereto specified by the treaty to be delivered; which duty being complete, his immunities of exemption from the ordinary process of law immediately ceased. Admitting that he had received any diplomatic powers from his Government, his obstinate refusal to exhibit them precluded me from the possibility of appreciating them. Letters of credence are the instruments which authorize and establish a Minister in his character; and, whether he be considered as Minister or agent, he could only be received in the quality attributed to him in his credentials. "But," says Vattel, "a more particular protection is due to agents than to other foreigners or citizens, and some regard in consideration of the Prince whom they serve." This regard was most punctiliously observed towards Colonel Callava, until the termination of his immunities as agent; after which, in his private capacity, he violated the treaty, the laws of nations, and the sacred privileges and rights of individuals entitled to the protection of the United States, and over whom I had been placed to administer the laws; to secure justice to whom it had now become indispensably necessary to punish him for his perfidiousness, and for his contempt of my judicial authority.

The time limited by the treaty for the delivery of the country, and the withdrawal of the Spanish officers and troops, had expired; and his pretence that he remained to await the decision of the two Governments in relation to the artillery, is a vile subterfuge, which claims no consideration or remark. His being permitted to remain was a mere act of courtesy, extended to him as a military officer of the Spanish Government.

In my letter to you of 26th August I remark, Colonel Callava's powers having ceased here with the surrender of the country, it was only a display (and so considered by me) of pompous arrogance and ignorance in his claiming the privileges of diplomacy, which, in fact, he never possessed; and his power having ceased, his commission accomplished, the pretence which he set up was an insult to the meanest understanding.

Having, as I hope, explained to your satisfaction that, at the time of Colonel Callava's imprisonment, he could claim no exemption from civil process by virtue of any commission he then held under the Spanish Government, and believing, too, that I have clearly explained and proved to your satisfaction that he never did exhibit any credentials, which alone could have entitled him to the privileges and immunities of a commissioner,

I shall proceed to explain some other points to which you have directed my attention. It is alleged by Colonel Callava, as well as by Mr. Salmon, that it was necessary Colonel Callava should continue in Pensacola, because the cannon belonging to the fortifications were reserved for future negotiation between the two Governments, and that, in the mean time, they were kept under his (Colonel Callava's) care. I would ask you, sir, how could Colonel Callava exercise any care or keeping over them? They had formally been delivered over to, and received for by me, and the Government of the United States made responsible to the Spanish Government for all that had been delivered, to await their respective decisions. Mr. Salmon, as well as Colonel Callava, has asserted what, in this respect, is not the fact. The language of Mr. Salmon, throughout, is exceptionable and insolent; but he claims this privilege, on this occasion, because "His Catholic Majesty had determined to give a new pledge, among many others, of his particular regard for the interests of the United States, in the permission which he has granted them of keeping in Mahon a deposite of provisions and naval stores, which they may introduce free of duties." Then, according to Mr. Salmon's rule of estimating favors, because His Catholic Majesty has granted this permission to the United States of introducing provisions and naval stores into Mahon free of duties, the United States ought, on her part, to have permitted His Catholic Majesty's officers to transport from without the United States any archives and documents which they might have chosen to secrete, free of molestation.

The allegation that I had, nineteen days before his imprisonment, written him a letter, acknowledging his commissarial character, is unfounded, and cannot be sustained by any proofs he can adduce. I did write him a letter on the 3d of August, remonstrating against his conduct in withholding a receipt which he had previously solemnly stipulated to give; and which, according to his arrangement with me, was to have been given on the 17th of July, the day on which the province was surrendered to the United States. In consideration of his leaving the ordnance in the fortifications, I agreed to supply, and did supply His Catholic Majesty's troops with provisions to subsist them to the Havana, and furnished transportation for their civil officers, families, and servants, and for the families and servants of the military officers; all of which was not stipulated to be furnished by the treaty, but for which we were to pass mutual receipts, and leave them for the future settlement of our respective Governments. These receipts were to have been reciprocally interchanged on the 17th of July, as above; but on that day he pleaded indisposition, and, on his sacred pledge of honor, I indulged him until that indisposition should be removed. I repeatedly called on him, through Major Stanton of the United States army, for a fulfilment of his agreement, (having on my part receipted for the cannon on the 17th of July.) I now ordered Doctor Bronaugh to accompany Major Stanton, and demand the receipt; and directed them to inform him, distinctly, if he did not then comply, I would report the same to my Government, and that the receipt I had given him for the ordnance should be considered null and void, inasmuch as the condition upon which it was given had failed by his refusal to receipt to me for the provisions and transportation furnished by the United States. I complained to him, in my letter of the 3d of August, of his signal breach of faith, in thus evading, on the plea of indisposition, the performance of a stipulated promise, which was to have been consummated on the 17th of July, before the surrender, "but which he afterwards refused to fulfil at all." I expostulated with him for his infidelity in thus violating his pledge of honor wantonly and corruptly, in first failing in, and afterwards refusing to perform that which he was bound in honor and by the most sacred agreement to have performed, but which he was permitted to delay until his alleged ill health should be restored.

You will therefore clearly perceive, sir, that this letter merely refers to what was agreed to have been done on the morning of the 17th of July, whilst his official capacity as agent aforesaid existed, and not to any thing which occurred after that day.

It is alleged that I did not call officially upon Colonel Callava to deliver the papers; to this I would reply, that our official correspondence had, of necessity, ceased by the termination of his powers as agent, and by the expiration of the time limited by the treaty for the delivery of the country. Sitting as the representative of my Government in my judicial capacity, administering laws that know no distinction between the rich and poor, the great and ignoble, I could not extend to him any privileges or indulgence which the laws did not guaranty; nor could I debase my representative character, or the majesty of those laws, by such a condescension, to gratify the vanity of a Spaniard, charged with being engaged in a fraud upon the rights and property of individuals living within the immediate limits of my jurisdiction.

The misinterpretation of which he complains will be explained, by the documents submitted to you, to be a falsehood, invented and propagated by himself. Indeed, his protest throughout is a tissue of wilful and corrupt misrepresentations and falsehoods, and, being sworn to, are absolute and premeditated perjuries, of which I feel no hesitation in believing you will be thoroughly convinced by a perusal of the evidence already forwarded to you, and of that which accompanies this communication.

In conclusion, permit me to request you, sir, to call on Mr. Salmon for the originals of his faithful documents. If they appear in the form of affidavits sworn to, they are forgeries, or John Innerarity has perjured himself, as you will see from his deposition, which I have forwarded to you, and to which I would on this point particularly refer you. With sentiments, &c.,

ANDREW JACKSON.

No. 1.

Affidavit of H. M. Brackenridge.

About ten days after the delivery of this province, I was applied to by a free woman of color, of the name of Mercedes Vidal, natural daughter of Nicolas Vidal, formerly the auditor or judge of this place. She informed me that her father had made a will, leaving his real and personal estate to herself and sisters; that it consisted of lands at Baton Rouge, and moneys in the hands of John Innerarity, of this place, as the representative of the house of John Forbes & Co.; that the lands had been fraudulently and illegally sold, and that the money and personal property were unaccounted for. She at the same time placed in my hands a record of a proceeding to compel the restoration of the will and testamentary papers, which had been taken from the office for some time before 1817, and were alleged to be in the hands of Innerarity, who, it appeared, had at length, after seven petitions, and many decrees, been compelled by the late Governor to restore them; which proceedings also contained two decrees, signed by Colonel Callava, annulling the sale of sixteen thousand acres of land at Baton Rouge, and ordering Innerarity to pay between $6,000 and $7,000 into the National Treasury, being a deposit in his hands of money belonging to the estate. On inquiring of Mercedes Vidal by what means these papers had been taken out of the office, she said it had been done by a friend of hers, in a clandestine manner; that, as the other papers would be taken away, she thought herself justifiable in doing so for her own security. On inquiring of the clerks who had been employed in the alcalde's office, they informed me that they did not know what had become of the testamentary proceedings, and could not tell in whose possession they were at that time; a few days after, I was informed by Mercedes Vidal they were in the possession of Colonel Callava, and that she had obtained permission to take them in separate pieces, in order to have them copied, but under the injunction that they should be placed in the hands of a confidential person. She accordingly obtained one of the pieces, and brought it to me; it contained the original will, the inventories and sales of the personal property. I then learned that they were not in the actual possession of Colonel Callava, but in the custody of a person of the name of Sousa, who had formerly been a clerk in the office. The first piece thus obtained was returned, and three others obtained from Sousa, and all exhibited to me, and a note taken of them. The latest proceedings were in 1810, on which there appeared a decree against the house of Forbes to pay a large sum of money in their hands as a deposit, which had not been complied with; but, from that time until 1817, nothing appeared to have been done. I was satisfied that the papers were such as ought to have been delivered under the second article; and the unexecuted decrees could produce no other conviction in my mind than that the papers were necessary to enable the heirs of Vidal to prosecute their right of property in this country.

Being at a loss myself what course to pursue, considering the connexion of Colonel Callava in the affair, I communicated it verbally to the Governor. He replied that, if I had sufficient proof to warrant it, an application made to him in writing should be attended to. On this I filed the petition, which will be seen by reference to the proceedings. The order was then issued to Colonel Walton, Colonel Miller, and myself, to proceed to the dwelling of Sousa, and to make a demand of the papers before mentioned, and of such others as ought to have been delivered to us under the treaty. We accordingly waited on him, and, when the demand was made, he appeared to be somewhat confused; declared that he had papers in his possession, but had no control over them, as he was the mere keeper of them for Colonel Callava. He produced two open boxes, which he permitted us to examine; with the exception of the papers enumerated in the list which was made by me, the boxes contained nothing but proceedings in court-martial, trials of soldiers, &c., and a few unimportant admiralty proceedings, but without any thing else relating to the property of the province. A demand of the papers was then made in writing, on which Sousa refused, for the reasons before stated. According to our instructions, the refusal was reported to the Governor. In the evening of the same day, Sousa informed Colonel Miller that he had waited on Colonel Callava to receive his instructions; that he had been absent from town the greater part of the day. He then delivered us a note, signed by himself, in answer to our written demand, which note we presumed had been dictated by Colonel Callava. The order was then issued on the following day for the sequestration of the papers demanded of Sousa, but which in the mean time had been conveyed to the house of Colonel Callava.

According to the instructions to Colonel Butler and Colonel Miller, Domingo Sousa was summoned to appear before the Governor, to answer interrogatories. He accordingly accompanied us, and entered the office about one o'clock. The examination which appears in the proceedings took place, in which he acknowledged the fact of the papers having been taken to the house of Colonel Callava. The officer of the day, Captain Dade, who had the charge of the prison, was sent for, and ordered to take Sousa into custody, under a commitment; but he was instructed to treat him with every possible indulgence, and Sousa was permitted to go to Colonel Callava, in company with Captain Dade, and inform him of his situation; that if the papers were restored to him, he would be set at liberty on delivering them to such persons as the Governor should appoint. Sousa accordingly went, and returned with Captain Dade about three o'clock, who reported that they had found Colonel Callava dining at Colonel Brooke's; that Sousa had had an interview with him, the result of which was, that the papers would not be delivered to Sousa. The order directed to Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh was then made out, and about half after four o'clock we proceeded to the house of Colonel Callava, which is situated a few doors below that of Colonel Brooke. We were informed that he was not at home; that he had not returned from the dinner party. We then proceeded down the street, and in about half an hour returned, when, on inquiry at the gate, we received the same answer as before. It was then determined that I should go to Colonel Brooke's, and request Colonel Callava to step to his house, as there were some gentlemen there who wished to speak to him on business of importance. I accordingly went, and found a number of gentlemen sitting in the dining room, and in the porch fronting the bay, after having risen from dinner; Mr. Cruzat, the Governor's secretary, was called out at my request, who immediately anticipated the object of my errand, and in a passionate manner called to Colonel Callava, who came instantly, and began with warmth to assert his rights as commissioner of Spain, and to talk of the laws of nations. They soon after withdrew, together with the Spanish officers. In the mean time, Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh had come to the gate, and, on being invited by Colonel Brooke, stepped in, just as the Spanish officers and Colonel Callava were going out. After remaining in the yard but a few minutes, we all returned and proceeded to Colonel Callava's house, and entered the back porch, where these gentlemen had just had time to be seated, I introduced Colonel Butler to Colonel Callava, and, after some commonplace conversation, Col. Butler then directed me to state the object of our visit. This was fully explained to him by me, in presence of his secretary and interpreter, and of Mr. Innerarity, all of whom were well acquainted with the Spanish and English languages, and who occasionally assisted. The utmost delicacy was observed by Colonel Butler, but Colonel Callava expressed himself in a very vehement and passionate manner, being naturally of a choleric temper. An hour, at least, was taken up in this conversation; every thing was fully explained; the written order from the Governor, containing a specification of the papers, the declarations of Sousa that they had been delivered to his steward, and repeated demands were made of them. He insisted on his alleged rights as commissioner; he said, if the papers were demanded of him in that capacity, or as late Governor, and by writing, he would reply. He said he did not know that the papers were in the boxes; that Sousa was only his servant in the affair; that he was responsible; that the papers were in his possession in the capacity of late Governor, and not as an individual.

After every effort was made, without success, to obtain the papers, the part of the order requiring him to appear before the Governor to answer interrogatories was explained. When this was made known, Mr. Innerarity exclaimed "the die is cast!" and Colonel Callava positively refused. He was told by Colonel Butler that his conduct would be considered as setting the authority of the Governor at defiance. He said that such was not his intention, but that he could not be proceeded against as a private individual. When we were about to withdraw, he said that, if Colonel Butler would deliver him a list of the documents, and they should be found in the boxes, they would be delivered. This was interpreted aloud by me to Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh, and in the presence of the persons before mentioned; if there was any mistake, it most probably proceeded from Colonel Callava, who omitted to add the words he had so often repeated before, if demanded of him as commissioner, or late Governor. We then withdrew, and in about a quarter of an hour I returned with a list of the papers headed as appears in the proceedings. I found Colonel Callava surrounded by a number of his friends, making unusual preparations, packing up boxes; and he said to me, himself, that he was making out a protest against the proceedings, and taking such precautions as would be taken by a person who expected every thing he possessed would be forcibly carried away. He talked of his papers, and effects, as if he thought he was about to be deprived of every thing. On presenting him the list, I informed him that nothing was wanted except the few papers therein specified, which could be found in ten minutes if in the boxes; that Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh would return in two hours, and then expect to receive them. He said that the paper must be translated, and, if the demand was made of him as commissioner, and in a proper manner, he would give an answer. The list was left with him, and I reported the circumstance to the Governor.

About nine o'clock, accompanied by a guard, Colonel Butler, Dr. Bronaugh, and myself went to the house of Colonel Callava. Leaving the guard at the gate and in the street, we entered the garden in front of the house, after removing the bar by which the gate was fastened. The house was shut up; the door locked. On our entering the porch, we heard a bustle inside resembling the rattling of arms. Admittance was three times demanded by me in Spanish, but no answer was returned. I then went round, and discovered several persons in the porch on the side fronting the bay. The guard was ordered round, and formed in front of high steps which lead up to the porch; they had a short time before been ordered into the garden, and had been drawn up before the front door. On ascending the steps, inquiries were made for Colonel Callava; they all remained silent: on the question being repeated, it was observed by some one that he did not know. The only light was a candle burning in one of the rooms. Colonel Butler ordered a candle to be brought from some of the neighboring houses. After waiting fifteen minutes, it was resolved to enter the hall, and some one brought out the candle. Two or three of the soldiers were then ordered up; we then entered the room where the candle had been burning, and Colonel Callava rose from a bed, with his coat off, and expressed great surprise at our entering his house at that time of night. The papers were then demanded of him, as is stated in the report of Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh. He persisted in the same reason which he had before repeatedly alleged. Every possible means was used to induce him to surrender the papers; the boxes containing them were in view, and he was told that if he would break them open we would take them. He was at length told, that, having refused to deliver the papers, he must go before the Governor, who was then sitting in his office and waiting our return. He at first said that he might be assassinated or murdered, but that he would not leave his house alive. Colonel Butler told him repeatedly that he might consider himself as taken forcibly from his house, and hoped he would not render it necessary to use actual force. It was impossible to have used greater delicacy to any one under similar circumstances. When the guard was at length ordered up, and the officer ordered to take him into custody, he consented to go; more than half an hour having passed from the time of our entering the house.

On entering the Governor's office, he was invited to take a seat, which he did at the table, fronting the Governor, while I was seated at one end of it, in the capacity of interpreter. The Governor then requested me to say to Colonel Callava that he was brought before him to answer interrogatories touching certain papers which had been delivered at his house by Domingo Sousa, in boxes, according to the confession of Sousa; and a list of the papers was read. This was fully and faithfully interpreted to him, in the presence of Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Cruzat, the secretary of Colonel Callava, both of whom understood the Spanish and English languages well. Callava on this rose, and, looking at his watch, said it was then ten o'clock; that at that hour he had been violently taken from his house; that he protested against the proceeding; that he was a commissioner of Spain, and was not answerable as a private individual. When this was interpreted, the Governor declared that he would hear no protest against his authority while sitting in his judicial capacity; that he could not know him as commissioner; and then ordered me to propound the question set forth in the proceedings, and which he had just written. Colonel Callava repeated, in substance, what he had said before, but with more prolixity and warmth; after some time passed in this way, he said he would yield to compulsion, but would answer only in his own language, and in his own way. When this was granted, he began to write, and, after writing a few lines, complained that his eyes were weak, and requested that his secretary might write; which was granted. He then dictated to Mr. Cruzat something in the shape of a protest, as a preliminary, as I understood, to his answering the question. After writing five or six lines, it was observed by H. Bigelow, Esq., who happened to be standing near the Governor, that he was dictating a protest. The Governor, on this, with considerable warmth, striking on the table, and addressing himself to me, said, "Why do you not tell him, sir, that I will not permit him to protest?" and which was intended as a reprimand to me for suffering Colonel Callava to proceed in this way, when he was repeatedly told that such a course would not be allowed. Colonel Callava then stopped, and his secretary left off writing in the middle of a word. I was now called upon to put the interrogatory, and to say that none but a direct answer would be received. I called upon Mr. Cruzat to assist in interpreting, feeling great anxiety that there should be no misunderstanding, but he declined.

The question was then repeated in the manner I have certified in the proceedings. It was fully and clearly explained to him. Much was said by way of enforcing the question on the one side, and of the objections on the other to answering, all of which I did not consider myself called on to explain; and, in fact, it was not possible; there was considerable warmth on both sides, and there was frequently not sufficient interval between what was said to enable me to convey more than the substance of what was thus spoken by way of argument, while much of it consisted of repetitions. When, at last, Colonel Callava found that he would not be permitted to answer in the manner he thought proper, he declined answering at all.

The steward, Fullarat, was then called up, and Colonel Callava objected to his being examined, on the ground that he was not of sufficient age. Some time was also employed with this examination; he answered that the boxes spoken of by Sousa had been delivered to him, and were then in Colonel Callava's house. The Governor, after the close of Fullarat's testimony, said, in a very deliberate and impressive manner, "that the papers had been seen in the possession of Sousa; that Sousa had acknowledged that they were delivered to the steward in the same boxes, and, by his declaration, were proved to be in Colonel Callava's house." The proof was therefore complete that the papers were in Colonel Callava's possession, and he was there called upon to deliver them; he was told that an officer would be sent with some one he should name, and bring the boxes; that he might open them in the presence of the Governor, and the papers specified be surrendered.

This was distinctly made known to Callava by me; and the Governor called upon Callava's friends, among whom was Mr. Innerarity, and who were acquainted with both languages, to explain it well. I was occasionally assisted by Mr. Rutledge, and every pains was taken that this part of the subject should be clearly explained. His answer proved that he did understand it. He repeated what he had said before—that he could not deliver the papers unless demanded of him as commissioner, or late Governor; that they could not be in his hands as a private individual; that he could not say whether they were in his possession or not; enforcing the same positions with a variety of other reasons, and of which I interpreted as much as I could; among them, he said that he could only be tried by a tribunal de residencia, which, at first, I did not exactly comprehend, until explained by Mr. Innerarity, at my request, to mean a court specially appointed to try Governors of provinces, &c., not amenable to the ordinary tribunals. The Governor, in the same manner, enforced his demand of the papers by a variety of reasons; he observed, they were such papers as were contemplated by the second article of the treaty, which was read to him; that it was his duty to see, for the safety of the inhabitants, and the protection of their rights, that all papers relating to the property of individuals should be left. The conversation, as is natural, was warm on both sides, and some expressions were softened by me in the interpretation, and others, tending only to irritate and provoke, omitted altogether. These were principally the appeals of Colonel Callava to the by-standers, which were frequent, loud, and inflammatory; and, on the part of the Governor, strong expressions against what he considered a combination between him and others to withdraw the evidences of the right of property required by individuals; which combination I understood, and so expressed it, to be between Colonel Callava, Sousa, and the steward Fullarat, but which seemed to excite some indignation, as he said "Sousa is my domestic, my servant; he is nothing in this business." The Governor did at one time remind him of the fact that the testamentary papers of Vidal had been, by his own decree, ordered to be restored to the office, whence, as he expressed it, "they had been stolen." As this expression had no allusion to Colonel Callava, and as I was not particularly called upon to interpret it, I supplied its place by a milder term. I considered the expression as dictated by a high sense of the injustice said to have been done the heirs of Vidal in withholding the papers, and as expressive of astonishment that Colonel Callava, who had compelled the restoration of those very papers to the office whence they had been taken, should think of carrying them out of the country after he had obtained possession of them. In the course of these remarks, the Governor reminded Colonel Callava of his having promised to deliver the papers if found in the boxes. Here Colonel Callava exclaimed "it is false!" meaning that he had never made any such promise, but which was mistaken by the by-standers. I stated that Colonel Callava denied the promise, and that it was possible that I might have misunderstood him, which drew from the Governor an expression of displeasure. In a strong tone of voice, he asked, "Why then, sir, were you not more cautious?"—words which proceeded only from the irritation of the moment, while he was almost sinking with fatigue. It was then midnight, and he had been sitting, with scarcely any interval, from ten or eleven o'clock in the forenoon. After the lapse of two hours the Governor rose from his seat, and called upon me distinctly to state that Colonel Callava must deliver the papers, or abide by the consequences; he, at the same time, called upon the friends of Colonel Callava who understood English to explain to him his situation. It was fully explained to him. This was several times repeated, and, at length, a blank commitment, which had been prepared in case of necessity, was signed, and Colonel Callava committed to prison. The next day I presented a petition to open the boxes and seize the papers, which was accordingly done, as will be seen by the reports.

Mr. Hannum's certificate.

I certify that I was in the alcalde's office on the evening of the 22d of August, when Colonel Callava, the late Spanish Governor of West Florida, was brought before General Andrew Jackson, the present Governor of the provinces of the Floridas. Colonel Callava entered the door, bowed, and took a seat which was handed to him, opposite to General Jackson, who was seated near a table used in the office. A short time after Colonel Callava had taken his seat, General Jackson stated to him, through his interpreter, Judge Brackenridge, the nature of the allegations exhibited against him, and requested him to answer the following interrogatory, viz: Were, or were not, the papers mentioned in a schedule handed to you by H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, delivered by Domingo Sousa at your house, this day, to Antoine Fullarat, your major domo; and, if so, at what time of the day? General Jackson informed Colonel Callava, through his interpreters, that those papers had been in the possession of Domingo Sousa, who had stated to Judge Brackenridge and others that he (Sousa) had delivered them, enclosed in a box, to the servant of Colonel Callava, at the colonel's house. Colonel Callava disclaimed the question at that time, and often afterwards, during the investigation, declaring that he was shielded by his diplomatic character as commissioner for the surrender of the country. General Jackson answered that his official functions had ceased, as all matters touching the surrender of the country were submitted to their respective Governments; and again put the interrogatory to him, but couched in different phraseology from the first interrogatory. Colonel Callava then asked permission to write his answer, which was granted. He commenced writing, and wrote but a few words; he then asked permission for his secretary, Cruzat, to write for him, which was granted; Mr. Cruzat then took a seat on the left of Colonel Callava; the colonel began to dictate a protest. Mr. Cruzat had written but a few lines, when General Jackson discovered that he was protesting against the proceedings. General Jackson then informed him, through his interpreters, that the question put to him was a plain proposition, and that he must give a direct answer to it. A long altercation then ensued: the colonel claiming his privileges as commissioner; General Jackson denying his right to such protection. Being sensible, from the stubbornness manifested by Colonel Callava, that he was determined to resist the authority of General Jackson, and likewise being satisfied, from the known character of General Jackson, that the colonel would be compelled to bow to the law, I left the room before the colonel was committed, and before the examination of Sousa or Fullarat. I am certain that no paper was wrested from Colonel Callava during my stay in the room.

Affidavit of John Miller.

I do certify that I was present on the evening of the 22d of August last, when Colonel Callava was brought before the Governor for refusing to deliver up the testamentary papers of the estate of Vidal, and that I attended to the conversation that took place on that occasion. I distinctly recollect that it was stated by General Jackson, that if Colonel Callava would send a person with an officer, and bring the papers and deliver them up, he should be released. No such expressions as that Colonel Callava "might protest before God, if he pleased," I am confident, were used by General Jackson. No papers were wrested from the hands of Colonel Callava; and, though there was occasionally some warmth in the General's manner, it was such as would be very naturally excited by the circumstances of the transaction. Towards the close of the examination, General Jackson rose, and observed to some gentlemen near him, (I think Mr. Innerarity and Mr. Cruzat,) "Gentlemen, you understand English; tell Colonel Callava, if he does not deliver up the papers, I will send him to the calaboose."

Given under my hand, October 22, 1821.

We were present during the whole of the above examination, and fully concur with Colonel John Miller in the facts contained in the above statement.

The Secretary of State to Governor Andrew Jackson.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 1, 1822.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of November 22, with its enclosures.

Translations are now transmitted to you, by direction of the President of the United States, of two letters received from the Minister of Spain, the definitive answer to which will be deferred until I shall have the opportunity of receiving your reply to this letter, with any remarks which you may think proper to make on the letters of the Minister. You will observe that, in that relating to the seizure of the papers at St. Augustine, he dwells with much earnestness on the agreement which had been made between Colonel Butler and the late Governor Coppinger concerning these papers. If that agreement was known to you at the time when you issued the order for demanding and securing the papers, will you have the goodness to state the particular grounds on which you judged it necessary to resort to compulsory measures for obtaining possession of them?

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir,
your very humble and obedient servant,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 27, 1821.

SIR: The President having appointed you judge of the United States for West Florida, and that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape, I have the pleasure, herewith, to transmit your commission, and to add the expression of my wish that the appointment should prove agreeable to you. In that case, it will be necessary for you to repair, with all convenient despatch, to Pensacola, to enter upon the duties of the office, there being reason to believe that the Spanish authorities will have delivered over the actual possession of both the Floridas to General Jackson before this communication reaches you; and, towards the organization of the temporary Government under his direction, it may be important that the judiciary department should be put into operation immediately. I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN, Esq., New Orleans.

[Enclosure in I.]

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the wisdom, uprightness, and learning of Eligius Fromentin, of Louisiana, I do appoint him judge of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape, to reside at Pensacola; and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfil the duties of that office, according to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said Eligius Fromentin, during his good behavior, and until the end of the next session of the Senate of the United States, and no longer.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, the eighteenth day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and twenty-one, and of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

II.

Mr. Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, August 12, 1821.

SIR: Having anticipated that it might be necessary for me to repair without delay to Pensacola immediately upon receiving my commission, I left New Orleans early in July for Pensacola, where I received yesterday, from New Orleans, my commission and your letter of the 27th of June last.

I thank you, sir, for the expression of your wish that the appointment may prove agreeable to me.

I am now ready to enter upon the duties of my office.

The attorney of the United States has not yet arrived; and the marshal has left this place for St. Augustine without appointing a deputy.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN.

HON. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State

III.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, August 20, 1821.

SIR: The time which was to intervene between the moment when I received your letter of the 27th June last, and the moment when I was informed my answer should be deposited in the post office, was so short that I could not then touch upon the topic which is to be the subject of my present communication.

When I first was informed of my appointment as judge of the United States for West Florida, &c., I understood it to be an appointment to the office of a Territorial judge, with the additional jurisdiction vested in the judges of such Territories where no district court of the United States has been established by the act entitled "An act to extend jurisdiction in certain cases to the Territorial courts," passed March 3, 1805.

Upon receiving my commission and your letter of the 27th June last, I was rather confirmed in that opinion by the concluding paragraph in your letter, in the following words:

"And towards the organization of the temporary Government under his [General Jackson's] direction, it may be important that the judiciary department should be put into operation immediately." I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that if the court to which I am appointed is to be confined, as General Jackson contends, to the revenue laws of the United States, and to the act respecting people of color, it could hardly be denominated the judiciary department, with reference to the organization of the temporary Government under the direction of General Jackson. However, I deemed it my duty to communicate my commission and your letter to General Jackson, who communicated to me, in return, such parts of his several commissions as he conceives admit of a construction entirely at variance with that which I put upon my commission and your letter.

It was, then, already too late for me to urge any objections; the Territorial court, consisting of five judges, created by General Jackson, (the presiding judge of which, by-the-by, is not of age, according to the Spanish law, which he administers, being only twenty-two years of age, and the law requiring, for that office, that he should be at least twenty-five years,) having been already in session one week before my commission reached me.

I told the General that I would write to you on the subject. He told me that he had either written to you already, or would write to you likewise. In the mean time, things must of course go on as I found them established on my arrival here, until I learn from you the precise intentions of the President respecting the extent of the powers vested in me. This representation, I beg you to believe, is not prompted on my part by the remotest desire of assuming a jurisdiction not intended to be given, but by a solemn obligation which I deemed to be imposed upon me, to inform you of the difficulties in which I am placed, and to desire you to transmit to me, as early as possible, the necessary information.

I have heard nothing of or from the marshal, or any deputy appointed, or to be appointed, by him, since the date of my last. I feel very uneasy on the subject, as the public service must necessarily suffer from the absence of that indispensable officer, there being no authority here by which the deficiency may be supplied.

The 27th section of the act of September 24, 1789, prescribes the amount and the mode of the security to be given by the marshal and his deputies, and the form of the oath to be taken by them; and, unless Judge Duval should now be in St. Augustine, to have those necessary forms complied with, I know not when I am to expect here a deputy marshal duly qualified. I say a deputy, because I understand that the marshal himself contemplates making St. Augustine the place of his habitual residence.

I took the oath of office before General Jackson. The attorney of the United States has not yet arrived.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

HON. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

IV.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, August 26, 1821.

SIR: At the same time at which this will be delivered to you, you will receive, no doubt, from General Jackson himself, a full detail of the outrage by him committed on the person of Colonel Callava. My unavailing efforts to have the Colonel released only brought upon me a part of the same contumelious treatment. I am not sufficiently acquainted with all the circumstances attending the transaction to be able to give you a complete history of it. I will, then, confine myself to giving you an account of the conduct which I pursued, and which, now that passion has somewhat subsided, I think, upon mature reflection, is the only conduct which my duty permitted me to pursue.

Early in the morning of the 23d instant I was informed that Colonel Callava had been arrested the preceding night in his own house, and carried to jail. Soon after, my house was filled with people of all descriptions and languages. By degrees the crowd retired, and it was not until about eleven o'clock that Messrs. La Rua, Innerarity, Dr. Brosnaham, and Father Coleman, returned to my house. The first three applied to me for a writ of habeas corpus. I knew that it was in vain, having no marshal to execute my orders, to send an individual, who could have no authority to demand it, for a copy of the warrant in virtue of which Colonel Callava was detained; and that, as that copy would, and perhaps ought to have been refused by an officer of the army to that individual who could have no legal character to demand it, I could not, from an affidavit of a refusal to deliver the copy of the warrant under those circumstances, find myself more authorized after than before such a refusal to issue the writ; and, indeed, could a legal demand have been made with success, in the absence of a marshal, from an officer of the army? Could anybody have obtained from either General Jackson, or the officer in whose immediate custody Colonel Callava was, a copy of the warrant? It is enough to have a right to trample under foot every law, to place the officers charged with their execution in the impossibility of complying with the requisites of the law. Would not the same uncontrollable temper which manifested itself at the issuing of the writ, have manifested itself at the application for a copy of the warrant, which would have prevented the issuing of the writ, because nobody then could have been found to serve it? I felt anxious, sir, after the application was made to me, that the only judicial officer of the United States in West Florida, although with the consciousness of not being able to accomplish it, should do every thing in his power to liberate Colonel Callava from confinement. Is it fair to apply to me, under the most extraordinary circumstances of difficulty, the severity of the forms intended to be complied with in a state of undisturbed tranquillity?

Besides, there are no indispensably necessary formalities absolutely required previous to the granting of that writ. The form of it may vary a little, according to the laws of the several States. Some may require security for costs, if the writ should be improperly applied for; others may require security that the party in the act of bringing him before the judge shall not escape; others may require other things; but there is not, that I know of, any particular prerequisite commanded by the laws, or adopted by the courts of the United States, which, I believe, follow, in that respect, the particular forms prescribed by the laws of the State in which an application is made for the writ. I was then, in that respect, bound by no precedent, and I was forced to adopt the only mode which I had it in my power to pursue.

The common law, by allowing that particular writ to be served by anybody, and upon anybody, seemed to have anticipated the peculiar difficulties in which I was placed. The only question, then, for me to examine, after a formal, though verbal, application was made to me, was, whether I had a right to issue the writ. With that view I consulted my commission. I find myself there styled a judge of the United States, authorized and empowered to execute and fulfil the duties of that office according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. I need not say that I consulted the Constitution; but I consulted the acts of Congress, and, in the 14th connected with the 13th section of the act of September 24, 1789, I find that all the above-mentioned courts of the United States have a right to issue the writ of habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdiction, and agreeably to the principles and usages of law.

But again, says General Jackson, the writ of habeas corpus is not extended by law to this Territory, and I must confine myself to the jurisdiction given by the act of Congress in the only two cases mentioned in the act, to wit, the revenue laws, and the importation of people of color; and could not I, in return, ask General Jackson by what act of Congress grand juries, and, in criminal matters, petty juries, have been established in this Territory? The General has established them. He has done right; I thank him for it. But is it more necessary for the protection of the liberties of the people that they should be tried in criminal matters by a jury, than it is that they should have a remedy against the wild ravings of ungovernable tyranny? Let the events of the 22d, and I might add of the 23d and 24th days of this month, answer the question. God grant that before long a still more eloquent answer be not furnished to the question!

Yet, sir, determined as I was, as far as lay in my power, to endeavor to have justice done to Colonel Callava, I was not less determined to have justice done to the country. I feel as deeply as any American any attempt, on the part of the agents of foreign Governments, to disregard the rights of the United States. I once had an opportunity of expressing my opinion to you in writing on that very subject, and I may safely appeal to what I wrote then for a correct expression of what

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

I must feel in every similar case; and, although I do not believe a word of what is attempted to be laid to the charge of Colonel Callava, yet, in consequence of the state of agitation in which the whole country was thrown, I deemed it a duty, under the discretionary power vested in all the judges, who have a right to grant the writ of habeas corpus, to require security; and I informed the friends of Colonel Callava, who applied to me for the writ, that I would, before setting Colonel Callava at liberty, require security for the production before me of the papers said to be in his possession. Security was offered to any amount. I mentioned forty thousand dollars—Colonel Callava himself in twenty thousand, and the two securities in ten thousand dollars each. Mr. La Rua and Mr. Innerarity agreed to become securities. I then issued the writ marked No. 1, and delivered it, to be served on the officer who had the guard of the prison where Colonel Callava was confined, to Dr. Brosnahan, another of the friends of Colonel Callava, who had joined in applying for the writ. In the mean time, I prepared a rough draught of the recognizance, a copy of which is sent, marked No. 2. The rough draught of that recognizance was on my table when Colonel Walton came to bring me the order from General Jackson to be hereafter mentioned, and I gave it to him to read.

I was engaged* in making some necessary alterations in the draught of that recognizance when I received, from the officer of the day, the letter marked No. 3, in answer to the writ I had issued. I dropped the unnecessary labor of putting the recognizance in a better shape. The soldier who brought me the letter of the officer of the day had scarcely left my house, when Colonel Walton entered it with the written order above alluded to, from General Jackson to me, marked No. 4. After some conversation with Colonel Walton, in the course of which I mentioned to him what I had done and intended to do in this business, I gave him to read, as before stated, the rough draught of the recognizance. I then desired him to furnish me with a certified copy of the written order which he had given me to read, and he agreed to call on me at 5 o'clock for my answer. He returned in about half an hour, and gave me the written copy I had applied for. In the mean time, having reflected on the strange message of General Jackson, I determined upon writing to him the letter, a copy of which accompanies this, marked No. 5. About 5 o'clock Colonel Walton returned, according to promise; and I gave him to read the letter which I had prepared in answer to the written communication of General Jackson. After reading it several times, he advised me not to send it, and observed that, as he himself knew that I was then suffering from a severe rheumatism, which prevented me from walking, he would state the fact in his return, and that I could thus further advise what I thought best to do. This letter was not, of course, sent to Gen. Jackson. We had some further conversation; and, at parting, I told the Colonel that, in the situation which I was, nothing but force would compel me to leave my house.

The Colonel made his return. I did not see him again that day; and when night came I anticipated a renewal of the scene of the day before, and prepared myself for the consequences; however, nobody came to disturb me. The next day about noon the Colonel returned, and observed that both the General and myself must be desirous of making a report of this affair to the Government by the next mail; that there was no time to be lost; and that it was the General's wish that I should call at his office the next day in the morning. After the Colonel had withdrawn, I reflected that the state of things was now somewhat different from what it was the day before: a reason was assigned for my having an interview with the General, the force of which I felt; and, ultimately, a longer resistance would only end in affording General Jackson the scandalous triumph of once more trampling upon the laws of his country. I determined to go there that very afternoon; and accordingly, at about 4 o'clock P. M., I went to the office of General Jackson. The conversation, as you may suppose, was nearly all on one side, not unmixed with threats of what he said he had a right to do for my having dared to interfere with his authority. He asked me whether I would dare to issue a writ to be served upon the Captain General of the island of Cuba? I told him no; but that, if the case should require it, and I had the necessary jurisdiction, I would issue one to be served upon the President of the United States. Ultimately, he wished to know the names of the persons who had applied for the writ of habeas corpus. I unhesitatingly told them to him. Then he wished to know whether they had made the usual affidavit, stating that they had been refused a copy of the warrant upon which Colonel Callava was confined. I told him no; that the application to me was a verbal one. General Jackson then required me to sign what I had just declared. I told him I was ready to do it, and I did it accordingly; Dr. Bronaugh, who was present at the conversation, having reduced that part of it to writing.

Much more was said by the General respecting the extent of his powers; the happy selection made of him by the President; the hope that no living man should ever in future be clothed with such extraordinary authority; how fortunate it was for the poor that a man of his feelings had been placed at the head of the Government, &c.; the whole intermixed with, or rather consisting altogether of, the most extravagant praises of himself, and the most savage and unmerited abuse of Colonel Callava, and of myself, for doing my duty, in attempting to set him at liberty.

The first time the authority of General Jackson is contested, I should not be surprised if, to all the pompous titles by him enumerated in his order to me, marked No. 4, he should superadd that of grand inquisitor, and if, finding in my library many books formerly prohibited in Spain, and among others the Constitution of the United States, he should send me to the stake.

I had taken the liberty, in the course of my conversation with him, to contest some of the powers he assumes as Governor and Intendant, &c.; of which legal powers, both previous to and since the adoption of the Spanish constitution, he appears to me not to have the remotest knowledge. As to the Spanish constitution, he will not hear of it, although it was solemnly sworn to here about sixteen months ago; nothing will do for him but the laws which were in force in Spain on the 15th of February, 1819. So that the first initiation of the inhabitants of Florida in the enjoyment of liberty must be by a retrograde step from a state of comparative liberty to a state of absolute slavery. I attempted to represent, but he would not let me go on; ultimately, I was permitted to depart without having suffered but in my feelings as an American.

The American flag, it is true—the flag of liberty—waves on our forts; a treacherous sign in Florida. Sir, the bohon upas tree of slavery overshadows our town.

Sir, it is reluctantly that I speak of a man whom I once delighted to honor; but I owe you the truth, and, painful as the task may be, I must discharge my duty.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

No. 1.

The United States to Lieutenant Mountz, of the 4th regiment United States infantry, greeting:

You are hereby commanded that you forthwith have the body of Jose Callava, late Governor of the province of West Florida, now in your custody, as is said, together with the day and cause of his caption and detention, by whatever name he may be known, before the judge of the court of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape, at his chambers, in the city of Pensacola, to do, receive, and submit to whatsoever the said judge shall consider in that behalf; and have you then and there this writ, with your doings thereon.

Witness, Eligius Fromentin, judge of our said court, this twenty-third day of August, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-one.

[Endorsed as follows:] I allow this writ.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN,

Judge of the United States, &c.

No. 2.

Jose Callava, principal, acknowledges to owe to the Government of the Floridas the sum of $20,000, and —, as sureties, acknowledge to owe, each of them, $10,000 of their estate, real and personal, to be levied to the use of the said Government, upon this condition: that, if the said Jose Callava shall personally be and appear before the judge of the United States for West Florida, and that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape, whenever required so to do; and further, that the said Jose Callava shall not depart from the city of Pensacola without the leave of the said court, nor send away, remove, or otherwise dispose of, unknown to the said court, any papers now in his possession, which, by the late treaty between Spain and the United States, ought of right to be delivered to the United States, which said papers are represented to me now to be under seal in one or more boxes or trunks, with other papers in the house of the said Callava, then this recognizance shall be void; otherwise, it will remain in full force.

No. 3.

PENSACOLA, August 23, 1821.

SIR: Your writ of habeas corpus, demanding the body of Don Jose Callava, has been received and referred to his Excellency the Governor, Andrew Jackson, by whose order he was confined, and who still directs that he be detained in confinement, until released by his orders.

I have the honor to be, &c.

P. WAGER,

Captain and officer of the day.

Hon. Judge FROMENTIN.

No. 4.

Eligius Fromentin, Esq. will forthwith be and appear before me, to show cause why he has attempted to interfere with my authority as Governor of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and Intendant of the island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of said provinces, respectively, in my judicial capacity as supreme judge over the same, and as chancellor thereof; having committed certain individuals charged with a combination to secrete, and with having attempted to secrete and carry out of the territories ceded to the United States the evidence of individual right to property within the said territories, which has been secured to each individual under the second article of the late treaty with Spain, and in open contempt of the orders and decrees made by me; and that the said Eligius Fromentin, Esq. be and appear before me, at my office, at five o'clock P. M., in Pensacola, to make known the above cause, and to abide by and perform such order and decree as the undersigned may of right deem proper to make of and concerning the same.

Given under my hand at Pensacola, this twenty-third day of August, eighteen hundred and twenty-one.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Governor of the Floridas, &c.

To Colonel GEORGE WALTON, Secretary of West Florida, to make known and execute the above, and to furnish a copy of the above, (if required,) returning this original, and in writing making known how he has executed the same.

A copy:

GEORGE WALTON,
Secretary West Florida.

No. 5.

PENSACOLA, August 23, 1821.

SIR: I would at all times have complied very willingly with any request of yours, although am at present so much indisposed that I could not now have it in my power personally to wait upon you.

Of the nature and extent of your powers, you now are the best judge; nor do I pretend to interfere with your authority.

In granting the writ which was applied for this morning, I obeyed the duty which I conceived to be imposed upon me by the fourteenth taken in connexion with the thirteenth section of the act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed September 24th, 1789.

I have the honor to be, with respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN.

His Exc'y Governor JACKSON.

V.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, August 23, 1821.

SIR: I intended to have accompanied my last with written references to several elementary writers on the common law of England, in support of the principles by which I was governed in granting a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava. Upon reflection, I thought it best to refer to them all generally, and to refer at the same time to all the laws of the several States and Territories of the Union on the subject of issuing writs of habeas corpus; and, likewise, to the code of laws prepared by the authority of Congress for the District of Columbia.

Now, I might ask by which of those laws was my conduct to be regulated? None of the formalities required or advised by either the English or American writers on the subject is indispensable. Otherwise, the same invariable practice must, of necessity, prevail both in Great Britain and in all the States and Territories of the United States. None of them can be said to be even necessary, since either the one or the other of these formalities which may be required in England, in Massachusetts, or in Georgia, may not be requisite in Vermont, in New York, or in Kentucky. And is it for me, by prescribing any (no matter what) formality for the obtaining of this writ, which formality has not been prescribed by the United States, to pretend to abridge, or to encumber with any previous obligations, the right vested by the Constitution in every citizen of the United States, to this invaluable writ? The prescribing of those formalities is the right of legislative authority. I took, and I was obliged to take, the common law writ of habeas corpus, naked and unencumbered with the restrictions which it has received, either from the often contradictory decisions of the several courts of justice in England, with which I have nothing to do, or from the statute law either in Great Britain or in the several States and Territories of the Union; none of which indubitably can be considered as applicable to the Floridas. My only duty, in which all the writers and the uniform practice of the United States and Great Britain agree, was, to see that no possible injury could result to the public from granting the writ; and against this I had amply provided, by requiring security for the production of the papers in the sum of forty thousand dollars. Further than that I could not go, without usurping an authority which was not delegated to me.

AUGUST 31, 1821.

Another part of my conduct may require a more detailed explanation than I could possibly give it in my last letter. I allude to the determination I took of repairing to the office of General Jackson. Sir, if General Jackson had been, or rather had professed himself to be, as I believe he is, only a military chief and an executive officer, I should have resisted his authority to the last. The worst then that could have happened would have been an imprisonment, more or less protracted, more or less severe. For that I was prepared. But, sir, be it remembered that General Jackson contends for unlimited powers. He is a Captain General; he is an Intendant; he is a Governor; he is a supreme judge; he is a Chancellor; he is — what is he not? What he may claim a right to do, nobody knows; nobody can tell. And in all these multifarious characters, if he had been able to dissemble, like Tiberius, and had not dragged me before his own tribunal, I have little doubt but that, upon the slightest pretence, he would have transferred me before the tribunal of his own creation, not less his own; to which tribunal, contrary to all principles recognised by our Government, he assigned a jurisdiction extending to death, graciously however manifesting his tender mercies to the people of these provinces, by declaring, as he does in his ordinance published in the first number of the Floridian, that there shall be no execution for a capital offence until the warrant of the Governor be first had and obtained. Sir, that man must get rid of me in some way or other to make room for a Mr. Hayward, or Haywood, from Tennessee, whom he told me himself he had recommended to the President for the office which I now hold.

I understand that, with this view, a memorial has been sent by the last mail to the President, purporting to be signed by persons who call themselves members of the bar. What the precise purport of that memorial is, I know not. Of all the persons who profess themselves to be lawyers in this place, I know nobody even by name, but Mr. Brackenridge, with whom, for fifteen years, I have been on terms, if not of intimacy, at least of familiar acquaintance. Whether he has signed that memorial or not, I am not informed. But if he has, it affords an additional proof of what rapid progress the gangrene of the most abject slavery can make, even in a few hours, when the vultus instantis tyranni, by striking terror in every soul, compels me to do that which, under every other circumstance, they would hold most in abhorrence. Such are the inextricable mazes of the labyrinth in which tyranny involves itself, that, in order the better to conceal the bastard origin of this memorial, it is not improbable but the memorialists, agreeing in the main point with their master, were made there to hold a language somewhat at variance with what are generally known to be the opinions of the man under whose auspices I cannot doubt the memorial originated.

And now sir, I have done with talking to you of myself on the subject of this detestable affair. I am sensible that I owe an apology for consuming so much of your time. Yet I could not have said less, in duty to the Government by which I was appointed, and in duty to myself. I now leave the case to the judgment of my country; and, anxious as I must feel for a favorable issue, I must be permitted to add, that I had rather fall in the cause which I defend, than triumph in that supported by my adversaries.

I have, &c.

N. B. When, in the line before the last of the third page of this letter,* I say that I should have resisted his authority to the last, I simply allude to my consenting to go to his office, under the circumstances detailed in my letter of the 26th ultimo, and not to any improper concessions, which I have never made, and never shall make.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1821.

Some less vague information, just obtained, of a report prevailing in town that I had apologized to General Jackson for issuing the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava, will necessitate, on my part, an application to General Jackson for a solemn denial of the atrocious charge. Of what may pass on the occasion, I will advise you by the next mail.

The following is a copy of the letter which I will send to General Jackson, as soon as I shall have closed the letters I intend to forward by this day's mail:

PENSACOLA, Sept. 3, 1821.

SIR: I am informed that it is rumored in town that, in the interview between your Excellency and myself, on the afternoon of the 24th ultimo, I had apologized to you for issuing a writ of habeas corpus, in the case of Colonel Callava. I hope your Excellency will not hesitate in enabling me effectually to contradict that report. Your Excellency cannot have forgotten that, from the beginning to the end of the conversation, I insisted, not only on the right, but on the duty, of a judge of the United States to grant that writ; and that, among other things, upon being questioned by your Excellency whether I would order a writ of habeas corpus to be served upon the Captain General of the island of Cuba, I told you no; but that I would not hesitate, if the case should require it, and if I had the necessary jurisdiction, to issue one to be served on the President of the United States. To this you answered, that the President of the United States was liable only to impeachment. I added, that I was confident that, in my place, you would have issued a writ of habeas corpus. I have the honor to be, &c.

His Ex^{cy} Gov. A. JACKSON.

VI.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, September 6, 1821.

SIR: By the last mail I had the honor to forward to you a copy of the letter which I told you I contemplated addressing to General Jackson on the 3d instant. I sent it to him accordingly, a little after twelve o'clock, by Mr. Alexander Scott, Jr. The verbal answer of General Jackson, as delivered to me in writing by Mr. Scott, is forwarded with the present, marked No. 1.

Before I proceed in the narrative, give me leave to submit a few observations on the statement made by Mr. Scott.

"He requested me," says Mr. Scott, "to inform you that the declaration which you signed, promising in future not to interfere with his authority, he deemed an ample apology."

Sir, I signed no such declaration, nor was I ever asked to sign any such thing; nor would I, if asked, have ever consented to sign it; the words "in future," which are here inserted, being intended, no doubt, to have a reference to the writ I had issued, which I never could have done, since I insisted on the contrary all the time, (as I hope to be able to prove by General Jackson himself,) both for the right and duty in me to issue the writ. Sir, if there be such a declaration in existence, it is a forgery. Yet a statement to the same effect was mentioned to me this morning, as having been made by a Mr. Connor, a gentleman in the family of General Jackson. I shudder at the bare suspicion of such a foul deed. But the fact having been mentioned by General Jackson himself, I could not help thus far, for the present, animadverting upon it.

I will at once take up the letter of General Jackson, (marked No. 2,) which is next in order. In that letter, I pass over all that relates to the General's opinion of the extent of my jurisdiction, &c., which has nothing to do with the question now before you.

The first thing which strikes me in this letter is not so much what is, as what is not in it. It forcibly puts me in mind of the passage of Tacitus, describing the funeral pomp of Junia: "Præfulgebant Cassius atque Brutus eo ipso quod effigies eorum non videbantur." The first thing I looked for in that letter was an account of the pretended declaration, said to be signed by me, as the General himself told Mr. Scott not two hours before I received his own answer. There must be such a declaration, since he said so; and if there be, there is no need of any thing else. This must be damning proof. Why not state it? Why not tell me of it? Did this avowal escape the General prematurely, in an ungarded moment? Has not the time arrived yet to make use of it? Does he intend to keep it back, to fall upon me unawares, when I may be supposed not to be prepared to repel the charge? or has it found its way to Washington, in support of the memorial of the persons who call themselves members of the bar here? Or, after answering the holy purposes of the General, has a timely fear of discovery, owing, perhaps, to some blunder in the execution, (I wish I could add, perhaps a timely remorse,) led to the destruction of the precious document? What has become of it? It once was in existence, or else why did General Jackson mention it to Mr. Scott? Why did Mr. Connor mention it to another person? Where is it? I say again, where is it? General Jackson states in his letter that I then declared "that hereafter I would in no way interfere with his authority." That is something, to be sure, considering the effect he attempts to give to it, by the insertion of the potent hereafter, and by the constructive apology he derives from it afterwards. But, sir, how weak, how watery, compared with this more than fourth proof evidence signed by myself!

I now turn to the accusing part of General Jackson's letter. "I acknowledged that I had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without proper information as to the facts of the case."

Upon endeavoring to recollect the whole conversation, I think General Jackson, in his usual mild way, made use himself of those words, or some others to the same effect. But that I acknowledged the truth of those facts, remains to be proved; and I will prove the very reverse, by the evidence supplied by General Jackson himself.

"Upon the importunities of John Innerarity and some other Spanish gentlemen." But General Jackson forgets that he states himself, to me, in his note of the 25th, marked No. 3, that it was expressed by me that the writ was issued on the verbal application. A vast difference, General, between application and importunities.

And now let me pause a moment and consider. General Jackson insists that I must sign a declaration stating that I issued a writ of habeas corpus on a verbal application—a venial sin, under all possible circumstances, sir, in comparison with the atrocious crime. And he does not ask me, who am so submissive, so compliant, whom he could so easily frighten into an irresistible submission by the dread of confinement—he does not ask me to put the infamous sign of my henceforward infamous name to the revolting catalogue of crimes, which, thank God, have no existence but in General Jackson's own imagination.

Is it possible, sir—is it credible—that if I had made the concessions stated in General Jackson's letter, the General would not, under the malevolence towards me which he has betrayed in every part of his conduct since my arrival here, in the same proportion in which I myself evinced moderation—is it possible, I say, to believe that he would not have had that part of our conversation too reduced to writing by Dr. Bronaugh? and if he has not had it reduced to writing, under those circumstances, is it not a most irrefragable proof that such a conversation never passed? Another proof, of no less weight, is the statement made by Mr. Rutledge, a young gentleman who lives in General Jackson's family, who was present at the whole of the conversation, and yet does not state any of the facts above enumerated. [See Mr. Rutledge's letter to General Jackson, No. 4.]

"And that, had I been apprized that Colonel Callava had been committed by him for contempt of his authority, I certainly would not have interfered."

Sir, it was unnecessary for me to enter into a discussion as to the judicial authority of General Jackson; for, as I before observed, the case had already been referred to the President. But, without insisting upon that point, I contended that I had a right to interfere in the case here, at the same time that I granted I should have no right to interfere if Governor Jackson, instead of being the Governor of a Territory, was the Governor of an independent State; but that, Governor as he was, Colonel Callava was, of course, detained a prisoner under color of the authority of the United States, and that, in that case, it was my right and duty to interfere.

But why do I say any thing myself on the subject? Sir, be so good as to turn to the last paragraph but one in General Jackson's first letter of the 3d September, marked No. 2. There you read as follows: "and I stated to you, that if you were in the States, you would have no right to interfere in the manner which you had attempted here; and referred you to the laws of Congress."

Sir, can there be a more ample confirmation of the truth of that part of the conversation above stated than those very words of General Jackson? for to what else than my own observations on the subject could those remarks of the General apply? But, sir, it is not all. Those words of General Jackson contain a positive admission that I had here the right to interfere, although I might not have had it in the States. What, sir! It was with his eyes open, and with the consciousness that I had the right to do what I did, that General Jackson rendered himself guilty of the many outrages offered to me in my official character! Oh, my country! Oh, the liberties of America!

Give me leave now, sir, to take a retrospective view of my letter to General Jackson, to which the one which I have just done analyzing is an answer; and what does it contain? A positive assertion on my part, that, from the beginning to the end of the conversation with General Jackson, I insisted both on the right and duty of a judge of the United States to grant that writ. Does General Jackson deny that fact in his letter, sir? Yet this cannot be true, if I held the language attributed to me by General Jackson. And we shall see, presently, in what style General Jackson answers, when General Jackson writes under the real or affected impression that the facts which he is going to refute are not true. Thus much, now, by anticipation, to confirm, by the silence of General Jackson, the truth of the facts contained in my first letter to him of the 3d instant, which I had the honor to send you by the last mail.

The next document in order is my second letter of the 3d September to General Jackson, marked No. 5, in reply to his answer. This letter contains scarcely any thing but a respectful denial of the charges made against me by General Jackson in his first letter of the same day, conveyed in as decorous language as my knowledge of it permitted me to use, and some further comparatively immaterial statements of facts, which sufficiently explain themselves, and require, of course, no comment from me. Let the letter speak for itself. I will only observe, that I sent this letter by Mr. Scott, within less than half an hour after receiving General Jackson's first letter of the 3d September; but, owing to General Jackson being otherwise engaged, Mr. Scott had no opportunity to have the letter delivered to him until between six and seven o'clock of the same day, P. M. The next morning, September the 4th, at about eight o'clock, A. M., I received, from the hand of Mr. Connor, above mentioned, the second letter of General Jackson, marked No. 6, dated September 3d, in answer to my second letter, which has drawn upon me the indignation and contempt of General Jackson. The indignation and contempt of General Jackson!

I beg pardon, sir, for the scandalous, indecorous, and disgusting scene which I am now compelled to open to your view. But, sir, because my enemy, like the swine, which delight in nothing as much as but filth, has thought it convenient to seek a refuge in the quagmire of Billingsgate abuse, shall I let go the hold I have of him? No, sir, covered with dirt, it is true, but nobly covered with dirt, which, coming in contact with such an enemy, I cannot protect myself from, I will still hold him—still drag him before the tribunal of his country—of his much injured country.

Sir, I must again beg pardon. I shudder at entering on the subject; but I must. I cannot help commenting upon every line—upon every word—of this most infamous document. The letter runs thus: "Sir, I have this moment received your second note of this day. The first created my astonishment, it is true; but the second my indignation and contempt. For I did not suppose, until your note now before me furnished the conclusive evidence, that you were capable of stating a wilful and deliberate falsehood."

What, sir! General Jackson, before he received my second note, did not suppose I was capable of stating a wilful and deliberate falsehood! But, sir, what is my first letter, which did not create the indignation and contempt of General Jackson, but a wilful and deliberate falsehood, if the accusation contained against me in General Jackson's first letter be well founded? Is it possible, sir, that the man who, from the beginning of the conversation to the end, could have insisted upon his rights and duties as a judge of the United States, could have made the concessions stated in General Jackson's first letter? and, if the two statements are irreconcilable, why, after reading my first letter, did not General Jackson pour upon me the whole flood of his indignation and contempt? No; it was not until after he read my second letter that he thought me capable of stating a wilful and deliberate falsehood. Does it not, then, necessarily follow, sir, from General Jackson's own confession, that the facts stated in my first letter to him are true; and, if true, that the accusation against me by General Jackson must be —? I will not, sir, out of respect to you, say what it must be. Let any honorable friend of General Jackson himself fill up the vacancy I have left.

Let us proceed: "That you have done so in your note of this evening, I do assert." I had, then, not done so in my note of the morning; otherwise, why does he not assert it likewise?

"— as the enclosed certificates of Doctor J. C. Bronaugh, (who was directed by me to pay strict attention to our conversation) and Mr. Rutledge, fully prove."

If any thing was wanting to establish the spirit of personal hostility to me, with which the whole of this business was undertaken and managed by General Jackson, is there not abundant proof of his motive afforded in the dishonorable confession he makes—he too, he says, acting in the highest possible judicial capacity—that Doctor J. C. Bronaugh was directed by him to pay a strict attention to our conversation? For what purpose, sir? To state the truth impartially? Why, then, did he not give his directions to Doctor Bronaugh in my presence? Why did he not notify me, since he himself had taken one, to bring a second likewise? No, sir, I was not called upon to fight a fair duel. Assassination had been resolved on—assassination in the dark. I was to be entrapped; and an American General is the author of the foul deed. Have we, have the American people, become prematurely decrepit in the short space of a few lustres, during even the lifetime of the worthies; of many yet, thank God, of the worthies, who, by their arms in the field, or their labors in the cabinet, succeeded in erecting the stupendous fabric of our liberty, the sheet-anchor of the liberties of the world—have we, I say, reached, already, the degenerate age of the Caligulas, of the Neros, of the Domitians, of the Heliogabaluses? Is the open profession of a spy—this most disgraceful of all professions—to receive among us the dishonorable honor of being publicly countenanced? Is any respect due to the testimony of a man who thus professes himself to be the tool of an employer, and that employer a supreme judge, and a chancellor sitting in his judicial capacity? Is our reputation, is our standing, is our liberty, to be placed at the disposal of men, who, although armed with unlimited authority, do not blush to descend to the low, mean, dirty artifices of the tyrants who, before them, have disgraced their age and country, and do not hesitate, unblushingly, to confess the disgraceful act? With that man, Doctor J. C. Bronaugh, I shall have nothing to do. I have nothing to say to him. The part which he descended to act is the best refutation of his testimony.

Yet, before I dismiss him, I cannot help observing how useless it was for General Jackson to have taken the trouble to direct that man to pay strict attention to our conversation; for the General himself seems no bad hand at recollecting. Both recollect very nearly the same thing; except, however, as to the word importunities, which is replaced in Doctor Bronaugh's letter by the words urged by; words, by the bye, of not exactly the same import, if I understand any thing of the English language. The entire conformity in the deposition of Doctor Bronaugh may, however, originate from the circumstance of his having, as he says, copied—not written, no, by no means—copied the answer of General Jackson to me; a new mode, to be sure, in our country; but (who knows?) perhaps a very good one for a witness to refresh his memory.

The next witness produced by General Jackson is Mr. Rutledge, to whose testimony, marked No. 4, I have already referred. Who can read Mr. Rutledge's letter to General Jackson, and not be struck with the hard struggle in the conscience of the honest young man? We see no such workings in the round statement of the first witness. It is true that Mr. Rutledge states "that I endeavored, by adducing the peculiar circumstances under which the writ had been issued, to offer something equivalent to an apology for the course I had pursued." Now, sir, I do believe that Mr. Rutledge has stated what he candidly believed was the truth; only Mr. Rutledge (and who in his situation might not have been similarly impressed?) makes use of the word apology for the word justification. What Mr. Rutledge alludes to, must be that part of the conversation in which General Jackson contended for the powers belonging to the Governor of an independent State; in which case, I freely confessed that if Colonel Callava had been confined by a State authority, I should have had no right to issue the writ; but that, in the present case, whether confined by the Captain General, or the Intendant, or the Governor, or, or, or, he still was confined by the authority of a person deriving his powers from the United States, and that, in that case, I had a right to interfere.

Mr. Rutledge further states "that I gave General Jackson distinctly to understand that I was determined not to interfere, in future, with any of the branches of his administration."

Sir, I have said so many times in answer to General Jackson, who (upon what ground God only knows, unless it be on the principle of the wolf in the well known fable of the wolf and the lamb) has been complaining of my interfering with his authority ever since my arrival here, that I never had, never intended, and never would interfere with his authority; that, I dare say, Mr. Rutledge heard me say so again on that occasion. But, sir, Mr. Rutledge is mistaken when he adds the words in future, if he understands these words as having a reference to the course I had pursued in granting the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava.

And here, sir, ends the testimony triumphantly produced by General Jackson. I may be permitted here to ask, why Mr. Rutledge did not give testimony as to the other heads of accusation contained in General Jackson's letter? Mr. Rutledge states that he was present at the whole of the conversation. Strange, indeed, that he should make no mention of the "importunities of John Innerarity; of my having confessed that I had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without proper information as to the facts of the case."

Sir, although Mr. Rutledge may not boast a retentive memory; although he did not pay, at the time, a particular attention to the words I used; yet, if I had held such or similar language, it is impossible that Mr. Rutledge should not have recollected something of it. What, then, are we to think of his silence? That the language attributed to me, or any similar language, was never held by me.

It may, perhaps, be said (for what may not be said?) that Mr. Rutledge answered only such interrogatories as were put to him. But, sir, who put the interrogatories? Mr. Rutledge is not a witness for me. He is produced by General Jackson; and can it be believed that, if General Jackson had anticipated from Mr. Rutledge an answer favorable to his views, he would have abstained from putting the questions to him? No, sir. That he did not put them, is conclusive evidence that he could not expect that Mr. Rutledge would prove them; and, as far as Mr. Rutledge is silent upon those points, his testimony cannot be interpreted otherwise than as a positive denial of the charges made against me by General Jackson.

Parting respectfully from Mr. Rutledge, again, sir, I must sum up courage to follow General Jackson himself through the muddy road which he has selected; again, I beg pardon for quoting his indecorous language. But what can I do?

"That you have the hardihood to deny that, when you called by appointment at my house, I did not send for my book to the office containing the records of my commissions and instructions—" The man is mad; I never denied any such thing. "And that I did not read the whole of them to you, shows that you are regardless of truth; and in this I do pronounce that you have stated another deliberate falsehood."

It might be difficult to rebut such a charge, when attempted to be propped up by such a broad assertion. But, fortunately for me, before I could possibly anticipate any such difficulties as now exist between General Jackson and myself, and at a time, of course, when I could have no possible interest in dissembling the truth of a fact, by no means of any importance compared with the odious accusations of General Jackson, to wit: in my letter to you sir, under date of August the 20th—I say, that "General Jackson communicated to me such parts of his several commissions as he conceives admit of a construction entirely at variance with that which I put, both upon my commission and your letter." As to his instructions, I never thought of asking for a communication of them. Since that time no communication of the kind took place between us, until, as stated by Mr. Rutledge in his letter, in our interview of the 24th of August, in his office, he again read either part or the whole of one of his commissions. The fact, however, is comparatively of so little importance, that it is still more to be regretted that General Jackson should have indulged in such foul language on the occasion.

The last paragraph of General Jackson's letter needs not to be transcribed. I refer you to the copy of it which I enclose, marked No. 6. It requires but few comments. In that paragraph the General, for the first time, to my knowledge, speaks of his legitimate powers. Would to God he never had exceeded them! The whole country would not now be thrown into a state of confusion and anarchy, calculated to imprint indelible disgrace on the American name.

One or two more observations, sir, suggested by this last paragraph, and I wash my hands of all the impurities necessarily contracted by the indispensable obligation in which I was to hold any communication with General Jackson.

"Recollect," says he, "the admonition I gave you," &c.—See his letter, No. 6. But, sir, to what purpose, I may ask, did the General give me the admonitions referred to, if it be true that I had apologized to him in the manner by him stated? Could the man who should have thus degraded himself by the humblest submission have required admonition? Sir, the uniform system of all tyrants before, whether republicans, emperors, kings, or generals, has been "Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos." Who, then, is this Moloch, to be neither conquered by resistance, nor propitiated by compliance?

No, sir, the admonitions were necessary, in the opinion of General Jackson, because I could not be driven from the stand which I had taken. Had I been disposed to abandon it, sir, those admonitions would have been useless; and the best proof that I did neither act nor speak in the way in which General Jackson attempts to represent it, is, that he deemed those admonitions necessary. The truth is, sir, that, tyrant as he is, General Jackson, at the very beginning of the conversation, before Doctor Bronaugh had joined us, had relieved me from any immediate apprehension of confinement, (if this apprehension could have had the effect of making me swerve from my duty,) by telling me that "if I had gone one step farther he would have committed me."

I appeal to Mr. Rutledge for the truth of this statement. What the General meant by saying if I had gone a step farther, I know not. I went as far as I could. He knew that I had no marshal, and that, of course, had I been so disposed, no attachment could have issued. But, be this as it may, I have the word of General Jackson that he was not, at that time, disposed to commit any outrage. To what purpose, then, could I have been induced to make concessions of a nature to disgrace me forever, when thereby I could obtain no additional certainty of relief which was not already secured by the word of General Jackson, if there be any security in the word of a tyrant? A tyrant, did I say? Sir, the word is disgraced by being coupled with that of General Jackson. The word Jackson, in future, shall be used instead of the word tyrant, whenever a correct idea shall be attempted to be conveyed of those portentous crimes, gratuitously committed, which throw in the shade the former crimes, prompted, at least, although not excused, by the passions of the Jacksons who have preceded him.

"Regardless," says General Jackson, in his last paragraph "of your boast of blood flowing," &c.

Perfectly in character, sir; what tiger, before General Jackson, was not regardless of blood flowing? and why not tiger Jackson, too?

I have emerged at last from the mire in which I was obliged to plunge in pursuit of General Jackson; and here, for the present, I must stop. I feel too much oppressed to go on, and, although uncertain whether my liberty will be spared to allow me time to finish this letter, I must rest a little from my fatigue, before I can resume the noble and erect attitude of a man walking on the plain road of honest truth, in the garb of becoming decency.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1821.

Give me leave now, sir, to recapitulate the material facts arising from the evidence which is under your eyes. I have myself no witness. My only defence is to be found in my very indictment. The only arms I have used have been forged by my enemies themselves. It is out of their own arsenal that I have been supplied with the only weapons for combatting their rage—very limited means of defence, sir, against such a powerful combination; yet, I still hope, not ineffectual. Sir, the outrage committed on the person of the former Governor had struck terror and dismay among the ancient population of Pensacola. "Is this," they said, (addressing me, when they assembled at my house early in the morning after the arrest of Colonel Callava,) "is this the liberty you promised to us? If our former Governor is thus treated, protected as he ought to be by his character and by his virtues, what are we to expect ourselves? Nothing remains for us to do but to leave a country where neither our liberty nor our property is respected, notwithstanding the solemn stipulations of a treaty."

Those, sir, are the very expressions by which both my ears and my heart were lacerated. The loudest consternation was, however, soon assuaged into a more dreadful silence still, by the fear of instant punishment. They were told that they had still a protector in me; that I had both the authority and the disposition to stop the Governor in his mad career of despotic frenzy. With what success I did it, you have seen. Under the impressions created by that state of things, in a newly acquired territory, I went to General Jackson's office, as I had before the honor of writing to you, in a spirit of conciliation. I carried with me my commission, which I showed him, and, by reference to the laws of the United States, I insisted, as above said, on the right of doing what I had done. I selected to go to his office an hour when I supposed that, not being expected, I would find him surrounded by fewer persons, and, of course, more disposed to listen to reason; for I knew it is principally when there is a crowd around him that, in order to show his superiority, General Jackson takes a particular pleasure in using the coarse, vulgar language, which is calculated, in his opinion, and in the opinion of his adherents, and of that class of spectators who, on those occasions, crowd around him, to bring into contempt the persons he addresses; and the higher the station of those persons, the coarser of course, is the abuse. In any other part of the United States the results from such an unbecoming course are, comparatively innocuous. Things are soon replaced upon a correct understanding. The case is vastly different here, for reasons too obvious to require a statement from me. I went, then, to General Jackson's. True, I did know, at that time, that Jackson was possessed of the infernal secret of causing the most poisonous waters to flow from the purest source.

In that character of a magician, he has exhibited against me a most atrocious charge. I think I have satisfied you that the evidence arising from his own letters entirely disproves the charge. If it cannot be said to be disproved by his first witness, (Dr. Bronaugh,) I am sure nobody can tell that the charge can receive any support from his parasite testimony. And as to Mr. Rutledge, silent with respect to the most important part of the accusation, he only gives an opinion as to what he conceives I intended to do. The very terms which he uses, "endeavored to offer something equivalent to an apology," proves that Mr. Rutledge, as I before hinted, used the word apology there instead of the word justification. A man may endeavor to justify; no endeavors are necessary to apologize.

There still remains, however, the bugbear of the declaration which General Jackson told Mr. Scott I had signed, promising in future not to interfere with his authority. Sir, on this occasion I can tell General Jackson, in the language of Shakspeare,

"Sir, spare your threats;

The bug which you would fright me with I seek."

Seek! I do seek it, indeed, sir. General Jackson said there was a document; one of his numerous secretaries said the same thing. Thousands, perhaps, have seen it. Everybody, sir, has seen it but myself; and shall I not be gratified by a sight of it? I have a right to demand it; and, if it be not produced, is there, sir, a name in the English language fit to be applied to the wretches who, despairing to conquer, have not blushed to resort to such vile arts to destroy a man who, in this whole business, can, so far as he himself is concerned, regret nothing except placing too much confidence in a man who, under his own signature, proclaims himself to be equally destitute of truth, of decency, of humanity, and of honor?

I have the honor, &c.

No. 1.

PENSACOLA, September 3, 1821.

SIR: In answer to the communication from you to his Excellency Andrew Jackson, he stated that he was then engaged, but would reply to it in due time.

He requested me, at the same time, to inform you that the declaration which you signed, promising in future not to interfere with his authority, he deemed an ample apology, you not having the right to issue the writ of habeas corpus; in doing which, you exempted yourself from that punishment which he would have inflicted on any private individual attempting to oppose him in the exercise of his judicial functions. He further stated that your jurisdiction extended only to the revenue laws, and the laws prohibiting the importation of slaves, which you had admitted; and that, if you presumed to issue another writ of habeas corpus, contravening his decisions as supreme judge, he would instantly have you committed to prison; that he would not go beyond his province in the discharge of his duties, and was determined not to submit to that indecorous conduct of which you were guilty in issuing a writ in opposition to his authority, instead of aiding him in enforcing the laws. I have the honor, &c.,

ALEXANDER SCOTT, JR.

No. 2.

PENSACOLA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,

September 3, 1821.

SIR: Your note, by Mr. Scott, has just been handed to me, and I am truly astonished at its contents; and, in answer, state, that when you appeared before me in the Executive Chamber, on the 24th ultimo, you did then and there state and acknowledge that you had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without proper information as to the facts of the case, upon the importunities of John Innerarity and some other Spanish gentlemen; and that had you been apprized that Colonel Callava had been committed by me for contempt of my authority, you certainly would not have interfered. And you further acknowledged that you had called upon me several times, in a friendly way, to advise with me as to your jurisdiction, and that I had always told you that it was my opinion you had no other jurisdiction, except so far as the laws of the United States had, by the act of Congress, been extended over these provinces; and that, when I showed you the powers which had been granted to me by the President of the United States, you declared that there was no necessity for your being here, and that you might as well return to New Orleans; and that I replied that you had jurisdiction over the revenue, and the infraction of the laws of Congress prohibiting the importation of slaves. And you did then declare that, hereafter, you would in no way attempt to interfere with my authority.

There was likewise some conversation in relation to the powers of a judge of the United States to issue a writ of habeas corpus in the States, except in particular cases; and I stated to you that, if you were in the States, you would have no right to interfere in the manner which you had attempted here, and referred you to the laws of Congress.

If this was not an apology, I know not what is. I viewed it as such, and dismissed you accordingly, under the citation by which you were brought before me to show cause, &c.

I am, sir, with due respect, yours, &c.,

ANDREW JACKSON.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN, Esq., &c.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Pensacola, August 25, 1821.

Major General Andrew Jackson, &c., with compliments to E. Fromentin, Esq., informs him that, in looking over the memorandum of yesterday, the word "verbal" has been omitted in the same. It being expressed by you, and understood by me, that the writing issued by you, styled a writ of habeas corpus, in the case of the confinement of Colonel Jose Callava, for contempt of my judicial orders and decree, was issued by you on the verbal application of sundry persons, without petition or affidavit in writing, that every thing may appear as it was transacted, Colonel Walton waits upon Judge Fromentin to ask him to insert in the said memorandum the word "verbal," in the proper place.

ANDREW JACKSON,
*Governor of the Floridas, &c.*E. FROMENTIN, Esq., Judge, &c.PENSACOLA, Sept. 3, 1821.

In compliance with your request that I would explain to you my understanding of that part of the conversation which took place between your Excellency and Judge Fromentin, upon the appearance of the latter before you, agreeably to citation, on the 24th ultimo, relative to these points:

Whether Judge Fromentin did or did not say that, had he been aware of the circumstances of Colonel Callava's commitment, he would not have issued the writ of habeas corpus in his favor, as he had done? and whether he did or did not declare that, in the future exercise of his functions, he would carefully avoid interfering with the lawful subjects of your Excellency's jurisdiction?—

I have the honor to state as follows: That I was present during the whole of the conversation, and, although neither a retentive memory nor a particular attention paid at the time to the words used by Judge Fromentin warrant me in referring to them, yet the impression which remains upon my mind, from the conversation above mentioned, is clearly this: that Judge Fromentin, after hearing the act of Congress, one of your Excellency's commissions, and some other documents, read, endeavored, by adducing the peculiar circumstances under which the writ had been issued, to offer something equivalent to an apology for the course he had pursued, and gave your Excellency distinctly to understand that he was determined not to interfere, in future, with any of the branches of your administration. I have, &c.

E. A. RUTLEDGE.

His Ex'cy ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

PENSACOLA, Sept. 3, 1821.

If your Excellency has been astonished at my letter, I may assure your Excellency that I have been no less so at reading your answer. I "acknowledge that I had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without proper information as to the facts of the case, upon the importunities of John Innerarity, and some other Spanish gentlemen; and that, had I been apprized that Colonel Callava had been committed by you for contempt of your authority, I certainly would not have interfered!" Never, sir, never! My blood recoils at such a statement; its last drop will flow before I subscribe to it. Give me leave to put your Excellency in mind that you began the conversation, and I could scarcely find time to place a word. Nor did you hear me mention Mr. Innerarity's name, nor any other name, until your Excellency asked me who were the persons who had applied for the writ; and then I mentioned Mr. Innerarity's name, with the names of the other gentlemen who, jointly with him, had applied for it. The conversation then turned upon the verbal application for the writ, when Dr. Bronaugh entered, and reduced that part of it to writing. The extent of your powers was the next topic, and you read the act of Congress, and began to read one of your commissions; but neither then, nor at any time, did your Excellency favor me with an entire perusal of your several commissions. On that occasion, as on every other preceding occasion, when our respective powers and duties were the subject of conversation, you insisted on my being confined to the two cases stated by your Excellency; and as that had already been referred to the President, it was unnecessary for me to insist.

It is most assuredly true that I said that I never had nor ever would interfere with your authority, nor, indeed, sir, with the authority of any other man. But, sir, does it follow that I am disposed to surrender the authority vested in me? Assuredly not. Legal authority is one thing; illegal authority is another thing. Upon that we differ. A higher tribunal than yours or mine must of course pronounce.

I have the honor, &c.

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

PENSACOLA, September 3, 1821.

SIR: I have this moment received your second note of this day. The first excited my astonishment, it is true; but the second my indignation and contempt; for I did not suppose, until your note now before me furnished the conclusive evidence, that you were capable of stating a wilful and deliberate falsehood. That you have done so in your note of this evening, I do assert, as the enclosed certificates of Dr. J. C. Bronaugh (who was directed by me to pay strict attention to our conversation) and Mr. Rutledge fully prove. That you have had the hardihood to deny that, when you called by appointment at my house, I did not send for my book to the office containing the record of my commissions and instructions, and that I did not read the whole to you, shows that you are regardless of truth; and in this I do pronounce that you have stated another deliberate falsehood. I have barely to add, that I recommend to you to keep within your legal jurisdiction and powers.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

Whilst you do this, all your proceedings will be supported, and all my aid given that may be necessary to carry them into effect. But when you attempt to transcend them, and interfere with my legitimate powers, recollect the admonition I gave you when before me on the 24th ultimo, and attend to it; or you will be treated and punished as you may deserve, regardless of your boasts of blood flowing, &c., which pass by me as the fleeting breeze.

Here, sir, on this subject, our communication closes, as I am too much engaged to read yours.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

PENSACOLA, September 2, 1821.

SIR: Agreeably to your request, I have the honor to state that I was present when the conversation took place between Judge Fromentin and yourself, on the 24th ultimo, on the subject of his having issued a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava, and that I paid the most particular attention to every thing which occurred on that occasion; and that you have correctly stated the substance of that conversation in a letter of this date, which I copied, addressed to Judge Fromentin.

After some remarks made by you in relation to his improper and indecorous interference in a case where your authority had been attempted to be set at defiance, and that, too, by force of arms, and, while sitting in your judicial capacity, treated with contempt, Judge Fromentin did acknowledge that he had acted hastily, without due consideration, and without a proper knowledge of the facts; that he had issued the writ of habeas corpus, having been urged to it by a number of individuals; and, being requested to name them, mentioned Innerarity, La Rua, Brosnaham, and some others; and declared, had he been informed that you had committed Colonel Callava for contempt of your authority, while sitting in your judicial capacity, that the writ of habeas corpus would not have been issued; and that, for the future, he should in no way attempt to interfere with your authority or powers. I am, sir, &c.

J. C. BRONAUGH.

HIS EXC'Y ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

VII.

Mr. Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, September 8, 1821.

SIR: Owing to the departure of the mail from this place two days sooner than the regular mail day, of which I was not apprized until this evening, I am very reluctantly compelled to postpone until next week sending you the copies of the correspondence between General Jackson and myself on the subject of his most atrocious calumny. I am not certain that there has not been even forgery in this business. All I ask is a suspension of opinion until I may be heard; when I pledge myself that there shall not remain the least doubt of my being innocent of the crime of apologizing for issuing a writ of habeas corpus.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

VIII.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, September 21, 1821.

SIR: My situation and the situation of the country become more and more desperate every day. When, after receiving my commission, on the very day on which the pretended county court created by General Jackson adjourned, I wrote you that things, of course, would remain in statu quo until I should hear further from you, I was under the impression that the court would not sit again for three months to come, and that it would be as easy in six weeks from the time when I wrote, when I expected your answer; and supposed, too, I should have a marshal to remedy the evil already done, with the co-operation of General Jackson himself, who, I believed then, honestly mistook the nature and extent of his powers, and for whose conviction only I wanted to hear further from you, under the hope of being able then to repair the mischief with as little scandal as possible: but the evil is making every day such rapid progress, that I am seriously alarmed at the immense number of suits, both civil and criminal, which are every day tried here, coram non judice. The county court holds adjourned sessions every month; and the General is engaged in hearing trials himself, more or less, every day. What his views are, I cannot tell; but I feel serious anxiety when I see him from the bench, which he has usurped, pressing indiscriminately into his service truth and untruth, fair and unfair. No American (much less one who once had such a reputation) could dare to trust his fame of honesty and sense upon the publication of such a rhapsody as was delivered the other day from the bench presided by General Jackson, and published in the Floridian of the 15th instant, under the head of "important judicial decision."

I was flattered a few days ago with the hope of being able at last to make an effort to put an end to this horrid state of things. A Mr. Saltonstall called upon me to inform me that he had been appointed a deputy marshal by Mr. Forbes. But, unfortunately, upon an examination of the documents, it does not appear that Mr. Forbes has given the security required by law, or taken the oath, &c.; so that, not being qualified himself, he cannot qualify anybody else. I recommended Mr. Saltonstall immediately to write to Mr. Forbes, and urge him to comply with the requisites of the law, and send me duly authenticated copies of the whole, accompanied with a new commission for Mr. Saltonstall. When this will arrive, I know not. But, upon reflection, what will it avail the public or me, in the present state of things? I can exercise no jurisdiction. The portion of the army here is under the orders of General Jackson. The posse comitatus would be inefficient. If my life was the only sacrifice to be risked, the law should be obeyed. But, under our government of laws and freedom, the most revolting system of inquisition prevails; and I am compelled to desire, as preferable to what exists here now, even the despotism of Algiers, Tunis, or Morocco. This place echoes with the most outrageous and impious vociferations, and that, too from a place called a bench of justice, against every body who will dare to question the supremacy of the Government. I am credibly informed that commissions have been, or are to be, sent to New Orleans, in order to find out, by depositions there, the name of the writer here whose description of the scenes which have taken place at Pensacola does not exactly tally with the account given by the General and his friends. I write to you with a rope round my neck. I can afford protection to nobody here, much less to myself. I have the honor to be, &c.

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

The Attorney of the United States has not yet arrived.

IX.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, October 28, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to send you, enclosed, some strictures upon the opinion delivered by the court presided by General Jackson, on the question of jurisdiction in the case of the heirs of Vidal vs. Innerarity. If I had animadverted upon every thing which is objectionable, without opinion, I should have been under the obligation of writing a book. I attached myself only to a few prominent parts of such gross absurdity and perversity as necessarily imposed upon me the duty of a few observations. The rest is so very, very despicable, that it must be left to refute itself.

You will receive, at the same time, an extract from some more copious notes which I have taken to answer such contingencies as future events may possibly create. In the meantime, this extract may not be useless, as it contains some more minute details of the motives of my conduct than I had it in my power to give in the hurry in which all my letters to you giving an account of the transactions here were written, immediately after they had taken place.

The blank left in the extract I send is filled up in the original notes by a narration, in all its essential parts, similar to what is contained in my former letters, and which I deem unnecessary to repeat here.

Allow me, in conclusion, to declare that, had I to go the same ground over again, I would again do what I have done. More than two months' reflections have confirmed me in the correctness of the course I pursued. I am desirous of the approbation of my country; but I am more desirous of the approbation of my conscience; and, turn things as they may, I have secured that approbation.

I have heard yet neither from the marshal nor from the attorney of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

[EXTRACT.]

There is to be observed in the conduct of every man a motive of action, which may be called radical, and which, when correctly ascertained, gives to an accurate observer the key of actions apparently not to be accounted for by any known rules. This is strongly exemplified in the conduct of General Jackson. From the moment he was appointed Governor of the Floridas, he seems to have been entirely overpowered by the madly gratifying belief that he was to be then omnipotent. And, indeed, to hear him speak, and to test his speeches by his deeds, one would be apt to think that this omnipotency was the sine qua non condition of his condescending to accept of the office. Mr. Brackenridge told me, himself, that the General was raving when he first saw the list of appointments which had been made for both the Floridas. His resentment knew no bounds, and the gratification at his own appointment was lost for a while in the mortification he experienced at the non-appointment by the President of the characters he had recommended for the several offices in these provinces. He accordingly lost no time in taking such steps as could enable him, when the opportunity should offer, and when necessity, in his opinion, should require it, to secure to himself that absolute despotic authority for which he panted, entirely regardless of that portion of authority vested by the President in the officers who were, jointly with him, to administer, in its several branches, the Government under his direction. His advisers on the occasion, he himself told me, were H. M. Brackenridge and Abner L. Duncan, esquires—Abner L. Duncan, the friend and adviser of all the tyrants, be they who they may. The notorious Abner L. Duncan, who, in New Orleans, in 1807, advised General Wilkinson to a perjury, was pre-eminently entitled to become, in 1821, the adviser of the unconstitutional, iniquitous, and tyrannical measures but too faithfully pursued since by General Jackson. *

* * * * *
The 22d day of August arrived. On that day I had been informed that the county court created by General Jackson was to meet again on the 1st of September, and, anticipating the fatal consequences necessarily to follow from the suits which were to be tried before that pretended tribunal, without any legal jurisdiction, not only for the parties themselves, but even for the judges and other officers of the court, and for the General himself, (all answerable to the parties in damages,) I had determined on that day again to call on General Jackson, once more to endeavor to open his eyes to the impropriety of the course which he had adopted, and which he seemed determined to pursue. The prevention, by all possible means in my power, of a continuance of usurpation pregnant with so many irremediable evils, scarcely left room in my mind for any other idea. Unable to administer justice myself, both because my jurisdiction was not acknowledged, and because the necessary officers of my court, through whom I might have attempted to enforce my jurisdiction, had not arrived, I thought it my most imperative duty, imposed by my commission, to neglect nothing at least that could put a stop to the scandalous and calamitous usurpation of my jurisdiction. The events of that day prevented my visiting General Jackson. I retired early to my house. In the night Colonel Callava is arrested; the next day I issue a writ of habeas corpus upon the application of some of his friends; the General refuses to permit it to be obeyed. All at once the volcano, where the jarring elements of an overwhelming destruction had been for some time working in silence, makes its eruption; the General sends me his celebrated order of the 23d of August; the Constitution of the United States, the laws of Congress, the commissions of the President, are all trampled under foot. The revolution is complete; and the Jacksonian * Commonwealth, which till that time had tried to worm itself into a sort of a miserable hanging life on the walls of our town, is actually spewed into existence.

General Jackson has now crossed the Rubicon. The country was invaded—conquered. Whether the usurper be a foreigner or an officer of the Commonwealth, does not alter the question, except so far only that, in the present instance, it makes the usurper more guilty. The flag of the United States, still permitted to wave here, and the uniform of the United States, still worn by the soldiers of the garrison under the orders of General Jackson, only add the crime of profanation to the crime of usurpation of the tyrant. But, although exercised in the name of the United States, still usurpation, still oppression, still tyranny, still terror, still Jacksonism, rule uncontrolled and uncontrollable over this ill-fated land.

Such were the circumstances in which I found myself placed when I was summoned, in the name of the law, to appear before General Jackson. And what law? And by what judges, and under what auspices, was the application of that law to be made? I confess it, I have no courage against the hangman. I knew that resistance was vain, and that it would be construed as rebellion, and perhaps treason. I was still haunted by the hope that, possibly, I might, by going, find an opportunity of exhibiting before his eyes, in glowing colors, the calamities likely to result to the people of this country, whom I still supposed he could not wish gratuitously to oppress, from the assumed jurisdiction of the county court created by him. This hope I must give up if I should absolutely refuse to go, and should suffer myself to be dragged there by force—the only alternative I had left; and yet, under the peculiar situation in which I was placed, the performance of that duty was almost the only thing for me to do, not to prove myself undeserving of the high office to which I had been appointed, not for the furtherance of my own views of self-dignity and importance, but for the good of the people, in the best possible way in which I could promote it; and if there was an occasion when the promotion of that good called for an abrogation of self, and for the severe and difficult obligation of fulfilling a hard duty, notwithstanding the obloquy which its performance might subject me to, this indubitably was the occasion. Better, however, be, than appear to be right. In order, then, to try to accomplish my object, I endeavored to steer a middle course. I did not go, in compliance with the order of General Jackson, on the day or on the hour appointed by him, sure as I was that I could obtain nothing from him when surrounded by a crowd. But the next day I determined to go at a time when, not being expected, I hoped I might find him alone. Vain hope! I ought to have recollected that the shark is never to be met with unaccompanied by its pilots.

But is it true that, correct as my motives and right as my conduct may be, still it wears the appearance of weakness? What! the man who issued the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava is a weak man! The man who entered the den of the ferocious Jackson with a determination, and who, in this most unequal conflict, did maintain all his rights, is a weak man! The man who, being informed, after more than a week, of the calumnies circulated against him by the minions of Jackson, applies to him for a prompt denial of the charges, is a weak man! The man who, struggling alone against a most unrelenting despotism for more than two months, has borne with becoming equanimity the (to him) honorable neglect of the men in office in Pensacola, from the highest to the lowest, each of whom, in the days of Jacksonian terrorism, strove to manifest his guilty zeal by becoming the willing executors (my ignorance had nearly betrayed me in writing the willing executioners) of the arbitrary will of their master, is a weak man! The man, who, without the assistance of any of the officers of his court, in a small town where there could exist not even the protection of a public opinion; where none were to be seen but oppressors and oppressed; whose silent and impotent pity was the only comfort to be expected; and that town, too, at such a distance from the seat of Government, that, the possibility of preventing evil being entirely out of the question, he was left with no other but the desperate resource that possibly those evils might be revenged—the man, I say, who, thus situated, notwithstanding he is informed of the steps daily taken by the tyrant, by illegally, and I might say inquisitorially, screwing witnesses to find a pretence to accuse and destroy him, still remains at the post assigned to him by his commission, unprotected but by his courage and the strength he derives from a steady adherence to what he deems his duty—that man is a weak man! Well, be it so; my opponents are welcome to the reputation of courage, most nobly manifested in their unanimous support of the many acts of oppression and tyranny of their apostle, in the sacrifice they have made of their own sense of right and wrong, of their understanding, of their probity, of their virtue, of their independence, and, as far as their influence could go, (not far, thank God!) of the independence of their country, at the shrine of their idol. Each and all of these sacrifices required, indeed, a courage which I did not possess. Most noble, thrice noble, high-minded republicans; brave, generous, undaunted freemen; who have had the courage (a rare courage in America, I hope,) of dancing by the sound of the music of their chains; of ringing a whole night those chains in the ears of their master—a sweet music in the ears of a tyrant; of offering up libation after libation in honor of their deity.

* Since the taking possession of Pensacola, all the play-bills were headed Jacksonian Commonwealth. I send one enclosed.

Indignation recoils with horror at such prostitution. Thus, after Nero had assassinated his mother, he was called the saviour of Rome; the brave of the day ran to kiss his parricidal hand, and all the people flocked to their temples to return thanks to their gods.

I am not unwilling to admit that, in the number of persons who joined in the dinner intended as a homage to General Jackson, there are some who enjoy, and probably deservedly, a reputation of honesty. Still it is beyond my weak understanding to comprehend that (to make use of the most indulgent expressions) indifference for injustice is not bordering upon cowardice and treason; still I cannot believe that it is not the duty of every honest American to oppose and resist oppression, to execrate and unmask tyranny; and I never can be made to subscribe to the suicidal doctrine of an unhallowed alliance between allegiance and usurpation, any more than to the countrycidal right claimed by some, of remaining neutral between them.

Be it recollected that this man, still reeking with the blood of his victims, had snatched from me the sword of the law—the last outrage of despotism; putting on the garb of justice the better to disguise its tyranny. It is an abuse of words to contend that by going to his office under those circumstances I recognised his jurisdiction over me. As well might it be said that travellers yielding to superior force recognise the legality of the authority of the highway robbers by whom they have been plundered. This is not the case of a man abusing a power legal in itself for the purpose of committing an illegal act in a Government in other respects regular. This is the case of an entire subversion of the government prescribed by the Congress of the United States for these provinces. This is the usurpation of a man who recognises no authority but his own; and this authority has no limits but such as his rage, sometimes perhaps weary, but never satiated, prescribes to him.

What military chief, what executive officer, before General Jackson, ever dared to refuse to acknowledge the authority of the judges, whose mandate they sometimes have refused to obey? What military chief, before General Jackson, ever dared to assume the authority of those very judges, and to claim the right of judging his judge? The abuses of which those military chiefs, in a well-regulated community, could make themselves guilty, had limits, the extent of which might be calculated beforehand. But who will be bold enough to assign limits to the crimes of which General Jackson may render himself guilty?

Whenever a military chief acted the tyrant in the United States anterior to the tyranny exercised here by General Jackson, there existed an independent population, which secured an independent jury. But here, under General Jackson, there are independent judges! There was a bar, the greater number of the members of which, if not all, were independent. But here!—

This mention of the bar leads me naturally to a single reflection upon the conduct pursued here, with respect to me, by persons calling themselves (by what right I know not) members of the bar of Pensacola. Who they are, with the exception of one only, with whom I have been long acquainted, I know not. One of them, named H. Bigelow, the man who, I am informed, wrote and caused to be signed the petition to the President, has lately become one of a band of strolling players, and has left the country. What that man is, can easily be ascertained by that fact alone. What the others are, (not to travel out of the record,) is, I think, abundantly made out by their own conduct towards me; and I might say towards themselves, if they have any self-respect. Strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that those men, (I speak of those who signed the petition,) one and all, have acknowledged and maintained the authority of General Jackson in these provinces as the supreme judge of the land; that they have argued causes before him, and before the court created by him; that the most absurd pretensions, the most extravagant doctrines, by which they conceived the supremacy of their patron could be supported, have been zealously maintained by them; that they, one and all, condemned me for issuing the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Colonel Callava. Supposing, then, that they were determined upon lodging a complaint against me, one would have believed that they should have denounced me for issuing the writ. Not at all. General Jackson takes that part of the business upon himself. His faithful auxiliaries, persuaded that it is better to have two strings to their bow, imagine another crime, and, apprehensive lest I may not be crushed by the accusation of usurpation, regardless of the reproach of disgraceful inconsistency to which they make themselves liable, they wheel about and admit, but only to answer their nefarious intentions, (ready, after accomplishing their guilty purpose, to return to their former idolatry,) that the judicial authority was actually vested in me, in order to accuse me of having acknowledged, as they say, that I had no right to issue the writ in question. What predominates in such conduct, whether knavery or stupidity, I am at a loss to determine.

Some strictures on a document published in the Floridian, at Pensacola, on the 15th of September, 1821, under the head of "important judicial decision."

The pretended important judicial decision which is the subject of the following strictures, having been delivered from the bench by a pretended court, of which General Jackson was president, I have inserted every where the name of General Jackson instead of the word "court."

I pass by unnoticed the long introduction, and what is given as the argument of counsel, in order to come at once to the reasoning of General Jackson.

He first refers to an act of Congress entitled "An act to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain," which says "that all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct;" and he logically concludes, from the words of the act, "vested in such person and persons," that, of course, all the military, civil, and judicial powers are vested in one person. In support of this position he reads one of his commissions, in perfect conformity with the law. According to the words of that commission, the powers and authority given are to be exercised "under such circumstances as have been, or may hereafter be, prescribed to him by the instructions of the President, and by law." What the instructions of the President were, I, of course, do not know; but that those instructions tally perfectly with the law, I do not doubt; and what the law is, we have already seen. The whole of the powers cannot be accumulated on the same head. They are to be divided; they are to be vested in such person and persons, &c.

Now, to what powers and authority do the law and the commission given by the President refer? No doubt to those in existence at the time the law was passed, on the 3d March, 1821. And what were the powers and authority exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the Floridas on the 3d March, 1821, and likewise at the time of delivery of the country to the United States? Undoubtedly, the powers and authority arising under the laws originating in the Spanish constitution. "There is no stipulation in the treaty," says General Jackson, "that the sovereignty of Spain over the Floridas should continue in force one moment after the signing of the treaty, and certainly not after the time limited by it for its ratification. In morals and good faith, the sovereignty was from that time in the United States de jure, and Spain had only the government de facto."

What the General means here, I confess I do not very clearly understand. Does he mean to say that, from the 22d day of February, 1819, to the 17th day of July, 1821, when West Florida was taken possession of by the United States, no law made by the proper authority in Spain for the government of the Floridas could be enforced in the Floridas? This is quite a new doctrine; and if any thing can be more surprising still than the doctrine itself, it is the manner in which it is attempted to be supported. Granting, for the sake of argument, that the sovereignty, from the time of signing the treaty, was de jure in the United States, and that Spain had only the government de facto: is General Jackson now to learn that the authority which exercises the government de facto has a right to enact and to enforce laws for the country over which it exercises that government de facto? The United States claim the sovereignty in virtue of a treaty, not only signed, but duly ratified, over all that portion of West Florida west of the Perdido, from 1803 till 1813. Was it ever contended that the Spanish laws enacted during that long period, which were applicable to that portion of West Florida, ought not to have obtained in that country, as long as that country remained under the government of Spain de facto, notwithstanding the government de jure had been for ten years vested in the United States?

"The act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty," says General Jackson, "has relation back to that time, as is fully expressed in the ratification not only of Spain but the United States; and the United States are only bound to maintain the inhabitants of the ceded country in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion."

How the act of Congress has relation back to the time of signing the treaty, except by referring to the date at which it was signed for an identification of the instrument, I know not. The King of Spain, in the ratification made by him, more than fourteen months after it ought to have been ratified according to the 16th article of the treaty, was obliged to state, as he does, that "the present ratification should be as valid and firm, and produce the same effects, as if it had been done within the determined period." But what were the effects here alluded to to be produced? Indubitably, the cession of the country to the United States, under the clauses and conditions originally stipulated in the treaty.

But does the General mean that this late ratification must now have the effect of preventing the introduction in the Floridas of any law enacted by Spain posterior to the time when the treaty ought to have been ratified by Spain, after those laws had been actually introduced in the Floridas? Or does he mean that it must have the effect of having possession delivered to the United States on the 22d of August, 1819, although actual possession was not delivered until the 17th July, 1821? This last position is more glaringly absurd, but not more so in reality, than the first. The General may make his choice. But, if his sentence has any meaning at all, I cannot guess at any other it can have.

General Jackson goes next into a long history to prove that the constitution of Spain is not in force in this country. If the General means that the Spanish constitution, as a political rule of government, is not now in force in this country, nobody will pretend to advance any thing to the contrary; but if he means to assert that the laws introduced under the Spanish constitution, as long as the Floridas remained under the Government of Spain, were not introduced in the Floridas, no person in his senses can give assent to such a proposition. Everybody in the United States knows that, after the expiration of the time within which the treaty was to have been ratified, to wit, after the 22d day of August, 1819, no alteration whatever could have been made by the Spanish Government in the constitution and laws of the two Floridas. Did not the right of Spain to legislate again for those two provinces revive after the 22d day of August, 1819, when the treaty ceased in fact to have any existence at all, no matter by whose act this non-existence was produced? Can it be contended that, when there was no longer any obligation on the part of the United States to receive the Floridas on the conditions stipulated in a treaty which had ceased to be binding upon them, the two Floridas were to remain without any Government at all? or with a Government entirely at variance with the form of government devised by the Cortes for the Spanish empire, of which the Floridas were a part? General Jackson acknowledges that the treaty was ratified by Ferdinand VII. by the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation, requisite but for that clause of the Spanish Constitution, which prohibits the King of Spain, without the consent of the Cortes, from alienating, transferring, or exchanging any province, city, town, village, or indeed any portion whatever, be it ever so small, of the Spanish territory? And am I to be told that when the Cortes agreed to the alienation of the two provinces of Florida by the King of Spain, in favor of the United States, the constitution, in virtue of which the alienation took place, was not in force in the ceded territories, which had uniformly acknowledged and submitted to the several forms of government of Spain during the long protracted conflict for authority in that distracted kingdom? Am I to be told that the Cortes stipulated that the inhabitants of Florida, in order to make them more acceptable to the United States, should, previous to the cession of the country, be politically emasculated, that they should be disfranchised of all the rights which had been secured to them by the Spanish constitution, and delivered over to the United States, bound hand and foot, loaded with chains and fetters? Am I to be told that the United States themselves, in giving their agreement to the cession to themselves of the country, under the clause that the ratification on the part of Spain "should be as valid and firm, and produce the same effects, as if it had been done within the determined period," exulted in the triumphant idea that, although the people of the Floridas had been emancipated in the intermediate time, still they might receive and treat them as slaves; that they insisted, as an indispensable preparation for the admission of the Floridians into the grand family of American freemen, that they should first re-assume the disgraceful badges of the slavery which they had thrown off? Such an idea could not germinate but in the head of a Jackson—I should have said in the heart, if a Jackson had a heart.

But General Jackson does not confine himself to reasoning on the subject. He likewise states facts in support of his opinion. Hear him:

"The constitution of the Cortes," says General Jackson, "was only promulgated in the island of Cuba some time in the month of January, 1821, about three months after Spain had parted with the sovereignty of the Floridas; and if it was ever promulgated in these provinces it must have been after that time, and long since Ferdinand VII., in ratifying the treaty by the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation, had parted with the sovereignty."

A bold assertion this, indeed! and which I should not have expected even from General Jackson! It is the first, I am sure, and I hope it will be the last time, when an American judge, whether de jure or de facto, shall have stated from the bench facts positively the reverse of truth, and the falsity of which was known to him. For myself, I had repeatedly put him in mind of the time at which the Spanish constitution was sworn to, both in Havana and in Pensacola. What! in the hearing of the American people, an American judge dare to assert from the bench, that it was only in the month of January, 1821, that the constitution of the Cortes was promulgated in the island of Cuba, when, by a reference to all the public papers of the day in the United States, it will be found that it was promulgated in the Havana on the 16th of April, 1820? The same constitution was duly promulgated and sworn to in Pensacola, in the midst of rejoicings and illuminations, which lasted from the 26th to the 29th of May, 1820. I have in my possession the proclamation of the Spanish constitution in the Havana, and an official copy of the oath administered here in Pensacola, to Governor Callava, on the 26th of May, 1820, when the Spanish constitution was promulgated here. Hundreds were ready to give testimony on these facts at the trial in which this opinion was delivered, but every application to introduce testimony on that subject was overruled; and in the hearing of thousands in Pensacola, who witnessed the celebration of that event on the days above stated, an American judge dares to assert from the bench, that, if the Spanish constitution was ever promulgated in Pensacola, it must have been after the month of January, 1821. Expressions are wanting to characterize such proceedings. Let us throw a veil over them. But what veil, of sufficiently impenetrable materials, can completely conceal from the public eye the turpitude of the unwarrantable assertion? And if it be not completely concealed, what mountain sufficiently high will the perpetrator of the unheard-of deed call upon to fall upon him, to hide him, to cover him, to protect him from the indignant wrath of the offended majesty of the American people?

Shocking, however, as the above is, still I wish the evidence against the usurper could stop here. But what are we to think, what are we to say, when, in addition to the above, notwithstanding the many attempts at reasoning the Spanish laws under the constitution out of existence in the Floridas; notwithstanding the positive assertion that the laws under the Spanish constitution are not in force here, we find that General Jackson himself has acknowledged that those very laws were in force here, and has made appointments to offices created by that very constitution? Under what authority but under the authority derived from the Spanish constitution has General Jackson appointed in Pensacola a mayor and aldermen? Under what authority but under the authority derived from the Spanish constitution has General Jackson an alcalde, and that alcalde, too, (Mr. Brackenridge,) the very champion who, in support of General Jackson's doctrine, contends that the Spanish constitution was never promulgated until Spain had parted with the sovereignty of the country? By referring to the date of the commissions of his predecessors in that office, Mr. Brackenridge might have ascertained very easily when the old form of government, and when the Spanish constitution in Pensacola, ceased. The (till now) pure white mantle of justice would shine still in all its lustre. It would not be, as it now is, sullied by a stain—and what a stain!

The last argument of General Jackson squares admirably with all that precedes. He grants that the President has appointed a judge for West Florida; but, says he, the judge is expressly required, by instructions contained in his commission, to consider himself as governed by the laws of the United States. Wonderful discovery, indeed! And what judge of the United States (except, however, General Jackson, who is to be governed by no law) is not governed by the laws of the United States? Is not the act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain, under which the judge is appointed, a law of the United States? and, under that law, is not the judge of the United States for West Florida vested with a jurisdiction extending to all civil and criminal matters arising under the general provisions of that law, as well as with the jurisdiction specially given in the same act, in all cases of revenue and of importation of people of color?

The judge (says again the General) must show the instructions he may have from the President of the United States. The judge is not bound to show any instructions. The instructions of a judge are to be looked for in his commission. But, in the present case, General Jackson has not even the miserable resource of screening himself behind this feeble intrenchment. The judge showed to General Jackson the letter which he received from the Secretary of State at the same time with his commission; and what follows is an extract from that letter:

"It will be necessary for you to repair with all convenient despatch to Pensacola, to enter upon the duties of the office, there being reason to believe that the Spanish authorities will have delivered over the actual possession of both the Floridas to General Jackson before this commission reaches you; and, towards the organization of the temporary government under his direction, it may be important that the judiciary department should be put into operation immediately."

Could any instructions connected with the commission of a judge be more positive, if a settled plan of usurpation had not previously been fixed upon? Here I stop; yet, before I part with General Jackson, let me heave a sigh—a heavy sigh. Quantum mutatus ab illo!

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to Eligius Fromentin, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, Oct. 26, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 20th, 26th, and 28th August, 6th, 8th, and 21st September, with their respective enclosures; all of which have been submitted to the President of the United States.

I am directed by him to inform you that the laws of the United States relative to the revenue and its collection, and those relating to the slave trade, having been the only ones extended by act of Congress to the Territories of Florida, it was to the execution only of them that your commission as judge of the United States was considered and intended to apply. The President thought the authority of Congress alone competent to extend other laws of the United States to the newly acquired Territories; nor could he give to the judge a jurisdiction which could only be conferred by them. There being an essential difference between the nature of the powers heretofore exercised by the Spanish authorities in those provinces, which were continued in force by the act of the 3d of March last, until the end of the next session of Congress, unless a temporary government should be sooner established over them, and of the laws of the United States, which were extended to those provinces by that law, the President considered it his duty to intrust the execution of each branch to officers specially appointed for the purpose. In the execution of those laws, in your judicial capacity, the Governor has been informed that you are considered amenable only to the Government of the United States.

In the different view which you have taken of the subject, he is persuaded that your motives and intentions were entirely pure, though he deeply regrets the collision of authority and misunderstanding which has arisen between the Governor of the Territory and you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, Nov. 22, 1821.

SIR: Notwithstanding all my exertions I could not obtain, until it was too late to have it forwarded by the last mail, a complete copy of the proceedings had in the case of the heirs of Vidal vs. Innerarity. I now send them, (24 numbers.)

Upon further reflection, I concluded that it was more proper for me to abstain from all observations on the subject; and I have, accordingly, confined myself to giving you a short, concise abstract from the Spanish records, to enable you to understand the case.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

I will only add, how unaccountable it appears to me that the statement of the auditors appointed by General Jackson should be said to be unanimous, when that statement is accompanied by a protest signed by one of them; and how much more surprising still it is, that the judgment of the court themselves should be predicated upon the unanimous opinion of the auditors, in the very teeth of the protest; and more so, still, in the very face of the objections, whether right or wrong, made by Innerarity to the report of the auditors, and bottomed upon the disagreement of one of them; which said objections were overruled by the court.

I have deemed it unnecessary to have the proceedings copied, which have been published in nearly all the newspapers.

I have the honor to be, &c.

DECREE.—Let it be done as the Auditor thinks proper.

AUDITOR'S OPINION.

Considering the character of a deposite in which this party (Innerarity) has the sum belonging to this meeting, and his not being able to claim any more than falls to his share, even were his objections to the account which has been drawn up entitled to weight, as also his inability to retain in his possession, under the motive he has stated, any other sum exceeding his credit: It is my opinion that you can grant him a month's time for the prolix and fruitless examination which he proposes; but on the previous condition that he makes a delivery of the two thousand six hundred and forty-five dollars and two bits, destined for the distribution amongst the other creditors, because he still remains in possession of the part which belongs to him, and because the tribunal has no legal authority to allow him, against the will of those, (the other creditors,) to continue in the enjoyment of a sum which can, by no title whatsoever, belong to him; much less when it is claimed by the rightful owners, and when he still retains it without having accounted for the proceeds of the effects remaining in New Orleans, the sale of which was intrusted to him by this same tribunal more than three years ago.

You will have the goodness to determine upon all this matter in the manner you think most regular.

CARLOS HERNANDEZ.

PENSACOLA, Nov. 20, 1810.

Seeing that Mr. John Innerarity has not complied with the delivery which has been ordered from him, let the present be made known to him for his compliance; or, in defect thereof, let the present be brought back, that the proper order may be taken.

No. 2.

PENSACOLA, June 30, 1820.

SIR: In these proceedings, the forms of procedure in all testamentary judgments have not been followed, nor has the still more necessary step of having a meeting of the creditors been taken; but, by making a confused mixture of the one and the other, a perfect labyrinth has been formed of the testamentary acts of the late Mr. Nicolas Maria Vidal, late auditor of war of this province, and assessor general of this Government, which may result from the malice of some individuals, and, also, in a great measure, from the parties interested not having had any lawyer to direct them.

An inventory was not made, as soon as said auditor died, of all his goods, with the formality which ought to have been practised; both because his instituted heirs were minors, and also because a part of his creditors were absent. All the moveable effects and slaves that remained amongst the property of said deceased, being once sold by the executor, who was Cristoval de Armas, it was determined, by the decree passed on the 27th of August of the past year, (1806,) that a meeting should take place in the study of the assessor of the intendency, for the purpose of taking such steps as justice might direct with regard to the cognizance, legitimacy, and graduation of their respective credits, and on the other points on which this decree turns. But neither did such a meeting of the creditors take effect, nor was any other point discussed, at that time, than the alienation of the sixteen thousand arpents of land, situated at Baton Rouge, and that of the furniture, moveables, and other effects which Mr. Vidal, deceased, had in New Orleans, contained in twenty-seven boxes; which he had deposited in the convent of the Ursuline nuns in that city.

This proceeding was followed by sundry incidents, more or less legal, and more or less important to the estate, of which there is no occasion to make any mention for the present.

At this very time, when Cristoval de Armas had not relinquished his charge of executorship, he was ordered, by a decree of the 18th of September, 1806, and its concordat of the 20th of the same month and year, to deliver into the office of the Secretary of State the proceeds of the sales which he had made; which he did, accordingly, to the amount of four thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars, in cash, as appears from the proceeding entered on leaf 78 of the third piece of this transaction; as, also, of one thousand six hundred and sixty-five dollars ninety-four cents, (6½ reals,) as an abonare of Mr. John Forbes & Co., the amount of various effects adjudged at the auction of the property of the late Mr. Vidal, aggregated at leaf 65; adding, that there remained in favor of the estate the debts of Mr. John Anthony Doneau and Mr. Jose Maria de Pefia, by reason of the same adjudication.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

At the instance of said Forbes it was determined, by the decree of the 7th of March, and its concordat of the 11th of the same month, in the year 1807, that the money belonging to this estate, which was found deposited in the Treasury should be transferred to the orders of the house of Forbes & Co. in the same quality of deposite, (Forbes's receipt $3,066 62½, as appears from the record above referred to.)

He was likewise authorized, by a decree of the 11th of September, in the year 1819, extending to leaf 128 of the above-recited third piece of these proceedings, to receive from Savino Perrin the amount of the adjudication of the sixteen thousand arpents of land, sold to him at vendue for the sum of four thousand one hundred and twenty-nine dollars eighty-seven cents, (six reals.)

Now, the heirs of Mr. Vidal establish, in their petition foregoing, the plea of nullity of the sale of the sixteen thousand arpents of land; and, on the other hand, pray that the house of Forbes & Co. render an account, within a peremptory term, of the sums which it has received of the credits which remained in favor of this estate at Madrid, and in the province of Antioch; as likewise of the proceeds of the furniture, moveables, and effects sold at New Orleans.

To avoid confounding and perplexing this transaction any more, I am of opinion that two separate suits be formed: one, on the nullity claimed by the heirs of the late Mr. Vidal; and the other, for the production, by the house of Forbes & Co., of the accounts, supported by documents, which is solicited on the part of the heirs.

The first ought to consist of the foregoing instance, and of the decision and decree which may be passed; of the documents contained between leaf 100 and 121 of the third piece of the testamentary proceedings, the comments of which were extracted for this purpose, except the taxation of costs found on leaf 111, being thus marked by the assistant witnesses; of the testimony of the acts of the meeting, leaf 58 and 94, the proceeds of leaf 20 and of leaf 99, as well as of the instance of leaf 128; the decree following, and proceeding of the leaf 133 and of 153 of the above recited third piece of this meeting or testament.

Before a resolution and provision is passed in justice, on the nullity of the sale of the sixteen thousand arpents of land adjudged at Baton Rouge, it will be proper to hear the party that ordered their sale, which was Messrs. John Forbes & Co., which company is at the present moment represented by Mr. Innerarity; and, therefore, it is my opinion that, the suit being once commenced, the latter gentleman be informed of the foregoing instance, made in the name of the heirs. As to what regards the account requested by the latter of Mr. John Innerarity, and which he was ordered to produce by the two acts, on the 9th March and 20th November, of the year 1810 past, without their ever having been carried into execution, I am of opinion that he be notified to produce, within the necessary and unprorogable term of ten days, the exact account, supported by documents, which is claimed of him, being warned previously of the consequences which, on the part of justice, will result in case of his failure to comply.

It is also my opinion that, until the legitimacy of the respective credits of the creditors, (who have presented accounts against the estate by mere private papers, which, in themselves, have no value in law,) be ascertained, he be likewise notified to deposite, within five days, in the national coffers, the sums above mentioned, placed to his orders in the character of a deposite, and the one thousand six hundred and sixty-five dollars ninety-four cents (6½ reals) of the abonare of leaf 65; and that, in the mean time, a proper suit be opened on the case, to begin with the testimony of the two otro si's of the foregoing instance, and of this opinion, and the decree that may ensue.

No. 3.

To His Excellency Major General Andrew Jackson, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the Island of Cuba, and of the Governors of the provinces of the Floridas, respectively.

The petition of Mercedes Vidal Palao, lawful wife of Severino Palao, for herself, and in behalf of other heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, deceased, respectfully represents: That, by the annexed decrees of Don Jose Callava, late Governor of this province, a certain John Innerarity, of the house of John Forbes & Co., and which he represents, was ordered, within five days from the 1st of July, 1820, to place in the National Treasury the sum of $4,163, in money, being a deposite placed in the hands of the said John Innerarity, and appertaining to the estate of the said Vidal; and it was also further decreed, that the additional sum of $1,665, the property of the said estate, and in the hands of the said Innerarity, should be deposited as above specified; and it was at the same time further decreed, that the said Innerarity should, in ten days from the said 1st day of July, produce an exact and documented account of certain goods belonging to the estate of the said Vidal, sold by the said Innerarity in the city of New Orleans.

Your petitioner further states, that, by another decree of the late Governor Callava, bearing date the 10th of July, 1820, the property of the said Innerarity, real and personal, was placed under an interdict, until the execution of the foregoing decrees.

But, notwithstanding the positive and imperious nature of the decrees above specified, the said Innerarity neither paid into the public treasury the amount above mentioned, nor has he exhibited an account of the sales of the property at N. Orleans.

Your petitioner having reason to believe that the said Innerarity is about to withdraw his person and effects from the jurisdiction of this court, without answering the demands against him, she therefore prays that your Excellency may cause the said Innerarity to appear before you, and show cause (if any he has) why the decrees of the late Governor, hereunto annexed, should not be carried into execution. And your petitioner further prays that the said Innerarity be held to give security for the faithful compliance with the decision of your Excellency, or that of such tribunal as this case may be referred to.

And your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

MERCED. VIDAL.

WEST FLORIDA, PENSACOLA,

Executive Office, August 28, 1821.

According to the prayer of the foregoing petition, let John Innerarity be cited to appear before me, at eleven o'clock to-morrow morning, to show cause (if any he has) why the decrees recited in the said petition should not be put in force against him.

Petition of Mercedes Vidal.

I, Mercedes Vidal, the lawful wife of Severino Palao, and heir legally constituted by her father, the late Don Nicolas Maria Vidal, Lieutenant Governor and Auditor of War of this province, present myself, with due respect, before you, and state that, in August, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, my sister Caroline, whose agent I am, filed several petitions in the tribunals of the then Governor of the place, Colonel Jose Mazot, to obtain the papers relating to the will of my above-named father, retained by Mr. John Innerarity; which petitions, when applied for by me in the tribunal of your Excellency, in March, eighteen hundred and nineteen, had no other effect than a continued opposition, supported by malicious contradictions; until, at last, said Mr. John Innerarity, constrained by my petitions and your superior orders, delivered the documents aforesaid, in appearance complete, which we had so long desired in order to bring forward with positive data our right and most just claims, which evidently appear from their examination, and operate in our favor the following incontrovertible injuries:

On the eleventh leaf of the second bundle there appears a decree ordering the aforesaid Caroline Maria Salome, my sister, to choose a guardian ad litem, which was not effected, naming by a feigned notification Don Jose Peña, as it is evident from his signature not being affixed, as would have been the case in a real proceeding; and subsequently that tribunal, disregarding the preference of my mother with respect to my guardianship, named one for me of its own accord, in the said Peña; from which it appears that our representation was irregular and illegal.

At page sixty-one of the third book, the executor is deprived of the most honorable part of his trust, obliged as well by this violent procedure, as by having before and afterwards abused him, by asserting that he was settled in New Orleans, which I called to your Excellency's attention, that, at that time, the inhabitants of the province of Louisiana had not been deprived of their privileges as Spanish subjects by His Majesty, but, on the contrary, favored their emigration, by presenting the greatest advantages to their interests; and, in fine, the creditors of my deceased father have assembled and have determined what was necessary and proper in relation to our inheritance, which is sixteen thousand acres of land in the district of Baton Rouge, in the terms expressed from page 113 to 123, maliciously asserting the estate of my deceased father to be insolvent, and in this way fraudulently charging it with his debts, although those from beyond sea are not properly authenticated, and remaining silent with respect to the sum (abonare) which the tenth clause of his will expresses.

Our persecutors, not yet satisfied with so many nullities, evade with the greatest subtlety the account to which they ought to be called for the safeguards of the minors, and that information so strongly recommended by law and necessity, and without which every thing will continue, as at present, to be done by our enemies, null: therefore, we pray that, on a view of the foregoing, as appears on the records, you will please to revoke and annul whatever may have been done in the aforesaid testamentary proceedings, and sale of the property of our before-mentioned father, and which in justice ought to be done, &c. Also, as soon as the executor (Armas) was deprived of the privilege of his office, to obtain this object, John Forbes renders himself liable to the various demands which he ought to have fulfilled, and they are those set forth in page 3 in book 7; for which reason we pray that John Forbes, and his representative John Innerarity, produce the proper discharges, admitting no excuses or evasions that may still further injure our inheritance, which from the beginning has been so unfortunate. Also, it having appeared on record that the said Forbes seized a deposit in the convent of the Ursulines, in New Orleans, consisting of twenty-four boxes of effects and two jars of China ware, without having ever given any account of the proceeds, as is proved by the order at page 154 of No. 3 of said acts, it is therefore prayed that Forbes, or his representatives, exhibit an account of the distribution of its proceeds.

Petition of Mercedes Vidal.

SOR. GOVERNOR:

Mercedes Vidal, lawful wife of Severino Palao, in the proceedings which follow in the testamentary acts of her deceased father, Don Nicolas Maria Vidal, auditor of war, and former Lieutenant Governor of this province, before your Excellency, with due respect, presents herself, and says that, by order of the first of the present month, your Excellency was pleased to decree that John Innerarity make the deposit specified, in the national chest; the amount of the credits which were presented against the estate of her said father (by simple private papers, which in law have no avail whatever without the proper authentication,) be ascertained; and also to add to this deposit the one thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars six and a half reals, the sum (abonare) set forth on page 65; but as the fifth day fixed by your Excellency for this effect was completed yesterday, the petitioner has not been informed that the said Innerarity has taken any step in the matter; and taking into view (with all respect be it said) his past conduct, exhibited in the decrees subsequently wrought at her instance, and that her sister, Maria Salome, and whose premeditated — caused improper delays in her just demands, she prays and supplicates that your tribunal may judge it fit to issue an order of execution against the goods of the said John Innerarity, in those which may be necessary for the accomplishment of what has been decreed, preferring, as far as possible, the moveable and personal property. Therefore, she prays that it may be ordered according to her petition; and that hers is just, &c. Also, in order to secure the rights of the petitioner, that all the property of the said John Innerarity be interdicted until the exhibition of the account, which he is bound to produce, of the effects sold in New Orleans, and reclamations beyond seas, as is expressed in the superior decree of your Excellency, the first of the present month; and the petitioner prays that the same may accordingly be done.

PENSACOLA, July 10, 1820.

As to the principal subject of the petition, let John Innerarity be forced to comply with the same, as provided; and the other, let the prayer of the petitioner be executed, in case that Innerarity shall not perform what has been decreed.

Petition of Severino Palao and Mercedes Vidal.

SOR. GOVERNOR: Mercedes Vidal, lawful wife of Severino Palao, in the proceedings which follow in the testamentary acts of her deceased father, Don Nicolas Maria Vidal, auditor of war, and former Lieutenant Governor of this province, before your Excellency, with due respect, presents herself, and says: That, by order of the 1st of July last past, at the fourth folio of the second parcel of her ulterior claims, your Excellency was pleased to ordain that John Innerarity should present an exact and proved account, which he had formerly, in March and November of the year 1810, been ordered to give, depositing at the same time in the national chest the sums mentioned in the said order of your Excellency of the 1st of the past month; which having been seen by John Innerarity, with the usual delay which he has always manifested in this business, doubtless (with due respect be it said) for the purpose of paralyzing it, as, unfortunately, he has succeeded in doing prior to my presenting the writing which corresponds to the sixth folio of the cited parcel, granting the interdict of the effects of Mr. Innerarity; upon which the superior decree issued of the 10th of the said July, which commands that, as the order has not been complied with by Mr. Innerarity, the said interdict to be of force; which, also, not having been complied with by Mr. Innerarity, all his effects are, as they ought to be, immediately interdicted. Wherefore, I pray that your Excellency will be pleased to order, without delay, the constitutional alcalde of this town, after being duly informed, not to permit the effects of Mr. Innerarity to be transferred or removed from this place, nor those that are in his power, belonging to Don John Forbes, until, as he ought, he fulfils what has been ordered, &c.

SEVERINO PALAO.
MERCEDES VIDAL.

PENSACOLA, August 11, 1820.

The petitioners, by Brackenridge and Call, their attorneys, further pray, that your Excellency may cause the said Innerarity to appear before you, and show cause (if any he has) why the decrees of the late Governor, hereto annexed, should not be carried into execution, and such other further relief extended in the case as may accord with right and justice. And it is further prayed, that the foregoing petition be taken as part of the petition of Mercedes Vidal, and that a copy thereof be served on the said Innerarity.

FLORIDAS, Pensacola, ss.

HEIRS OF VIDAL vs. JOHN INNERARITY.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS,
August 29, 1821.

John Innerarity appeared this day at 11 o'clock A. M., agreeably to citation, before Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, &c. and John C. Mitchell, Esq., (appointed by him to sit with him during the hearing of the case, in the room of Presiding Justice D. Shannon, Esq., who could not attend from indisposition;) and the said Innerarity, on being asked by the court to show cause (if any he had) why the decrees of the late Governor of West Florida, Don Jose Callava, against the said Innerarity, according to the petition of Mercedes Vidal, in behalf of herself and her sister Caroline Vidal, and other heirs of their deceased father, should not be carried into effect; when he, the said Innerarity, made answer that he objected to the petition of Mercedes Vidal, it being in the name of the wife, without the signature and consent of her husband; and, as such, that she had not the right to sue, &c. The objection was for the present overruled, on the ground that this suit had been instituted by the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, deceased; that this petition was filed not to institute a suit, but merely to have carried into effect the decrees already made in their behalf, and which have not been carried into effect. That this petition of Mercedes Vidal has been filed, as well for her sister Caroline, whose agent she is, as for herself and the other heirs of her deceased father; and, sitting as a court of chancery, we cannot permit the combination or laches of others to prejudice the heirs, particularly to prevent this decree from being carried into effect, to the prejudice of Caroline Vidal, one of the heirs legally represented by her sister. If this could have been taken advantage of, it ought to have been done before the decrees had been made, by plea in abatement; that it is now too late to make this objection, when one of the heirs is legally before the court, praying, as the other heirs have often done before, that these decrees may be carried into full effect; and particularly when the petition of Severino Palao (husband) and Mercedes Vidal, his wife, under date of the 11th of August, 1820, is presented to the court, and which has not been acted on, and which the counsel for the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, deceased, (Henry M. Brackenridge and Richard K. Call, Esquires,) pray may be received as an amendment to the petition of Mercedes Vidal, in behalf of herself and her sister, Caroline, and other heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal, deceased; which amendment is granted. The said Innerarity then prayed the court for a continuance of this cause for a longer period of time, in order that he might make a full defence and objection, and show cause why the decrees against him should not be carried into effect; and, in compliance with the prayer of the said Innerarity, the court granted to him an extension of time to the sixth day of September next, at ten o'clock A. M., at the Executive Chambers, where this cause will again be heard, and to which day this cause stands continued. The said Innerarity then prayed that he might be suffered to take with him, for perusal and examination, the papers or books relating to this case, on his giving to the alcalde of the city of Pensacola (H. M. Brackenridge, Esq.) a proper receipt for the same, and for their return; (which papers or books are specified in the receipt;) and, the said Innerarity having executed such receipt, the court granted his prayer.

Done at the Executive Chambers, and in open court, the 29th August, 1821.

Petition of John Innerarity.

May it please your Excellency:

Don Juan Innerarity, a Spanish citizen, and resident of Pensacola, reserving to himself the plea at law of coram non judge, and every other plea, special and general, de jure, under the ægis of your Excellency's proclamation, in answer to the prayer of Messrs. Brackenridge and Call, subjoined as an addendum to the copy (which has been served on me) of a petition of Severino Palao and his wife, Mercedes Vidal, free people of color, purporting to be addressed to the late Governor of this province, Don Jose Callava, and to bear date so far back as the 11th of August, 1820, and without the slightest shadow of notarial or other evidence that the same was ever presented to the said ex-Governor in his capacity of military judge, or in any other whatever, most respectfully represents: That the said Messrs. Brackenridge and Call have not legalized their representation as attorneys for the said Severino Palao and Mercedes Vidal, agreeably to the Spanish laws, contained in the laws of the Partidas, lex. 10, tit. 5, p. 3, and in Febrero Adicionado, tom. 3, part 1, cap. 14, art. 15, which states that "no one can appear at law for another, unless under a power of attorney in scriptis, excepting in the following cases: the husband for the wife; the relation for the relations of the nearest consanguinity, as far as the fourth degree; or for his servant or kinsman; or by reason of the manumission of slaves, who can appear at law ille pro illis, without a power of attorney from the party interested, unless the latter should resist the proceedings. Heirs, also, who possess undivided property, and partners of a firm, can also appear at law, provided to their so appearing at law they shall previously give bond and security, under a penalty that the parties whom they represent shall consider as valid all that may be done and performed in the suit, and, if they should not adhere thereto, they and their securities shall pay to the contending party the penalty imposed on them; but the bond and security ought to be exacted previously to the showing cause, or to the reply in defence." Your exponent could cite several other orthodox authorities; but, as they are all to the same purport, he considers that it would be a work of supererogation.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

Your petitioner, therefore, most respectfully begs that Messrs. Brackenridge and Call may qualify their representation in forma legis, by proper instruments in scriptis, and that the security required by the Spanish laws may be given, and notarial copies thereof annexed to the proceedings, giving to your petitioner a traslado, or sight of every thing had or done in the premises, on the ground that what is not done in proper legal form is not done at all in the eye of the law. With this evidence, and that of the eventual indemnity provided by law, your petitioner will then answer to the unfounded claim of the plaintiffs, and show cause why the interlocutory decrees referred to in your Excellency's citation should not be enforced. All which he most respectfully submits, and claims the protection of the laws and of your Excellency, as the guardian in your high capacity of superior political chief of the Floridas.

For the purposes which your petitioner will hereafter show, he begs leave to advert to the circumstance of the claimants' having fixed a date to their memorial, for which they have furnished no precedent in their other occult petitions; nor is the modus operandi at law.

JOHN INNERARITY, ads. MERCEDES VIDAL.

And this defendant, by protestation, not confessing or acknowledging all or any of the matters and things in the petitioner's said petition contained to be true, in such manner and form as the same are therein alleged and set forth, for plea unto the said petition, saith: That this honorable court hath no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said petition, and cannot lawfully take any cognizance thereof, nor pronounce any decree, or enter upon any judgment in the premises, that will or can be binding or obligatory on the parties. All which matters and things this defendant is ready to aver, justify, maintain, and prove, and humbly prays judgment whether this honorable court will take further cognizance of the complaint in the said petitioner's petition contained, and to be hence dismissed with his reasonable costs by him in this behalf sustained.

Petition of John Innerarity.

To His Excellency Major General Andrew Jackson, exercising the powers of the Captain General and Intendant of the island of Cuba, and of the Governors of the provinces of the Floridas, respectively:

John Innerarity, on whom a rule has been served to show cause why the decrees recited in the petition of Mercedes Vidal should not be put in force against him, respectfully shows, by way of answer to said petition, and why the said decrees ought not to be enforced, that the said decrees have no operative force, and are not binding in law:

1. Because the said decrees are founded on a suit to which the said John Innerarity has never received any citation to appear, and of the institution and pendency of which he has never been notified, as required by law.

2. Because the said decrees themselves have never been notified to him after the making and entering up thereof, as required by the Spanish laws; and, therefore, for this reason, are null and void.

3. Because, by the laws of Spain, simple decrees are never final until they have progressed to the definitive sentence, three times solemnly adjudged in the manner prescribed by law, in the presence of the parties thereto, after due notification.

And the said John Innerarity further shows to this honorable court, that if the said decrees had been clothed with the necessary legal formalities, still, in foro conscientie, they ought not to be enforced:

1. Because the subject-matter of the suit in which they are entered up had, long previously thereto, to wit, in the year 1810, been settled and put at rest, by the competent tribunal, upon due examination and deliberate consideration, and after ample notice to all the parties interested, or in anywise concerned therein.

2. Because all the deposits which have been made with Mr. John Forbes have been paid over to the proper persons appointed to receive them, under the orders or decrees of the proper tribunal; and because the particular deposits specified in the said decrees have, in truth and in fact, never been made.

3. Because the goods belonging to the estate of Vidal, in the said decrees alleged to have been sold by John Forbes in New Orleans, and of the sale whereof the said John Innerarity is by said decrees required to render an account, were not, in truth and in fact, sold by the said John Forbes, nor by the said John Innerarity, but were sold by the sheriff of the city of New Orleans, under a judgment of the superior court of the Territory of Orleans, as will more fully appear by the record of the said judgment herewith accompanying, marked A, and which the said John Innerarity prays may be received by this honorable court as a part of this his showing.

And, moreover, the said John Innerarity shows, that all the deposits which have been made with the said John Forbes, of moneys belonging to the estate of Vidal, were made with him in his own individual capacity, and not with the house of John Forbes & Co.; that he, the said John Innerarity, was, at the time of said transaction referred to in said decree, a minor, and not one of the firm of Forbes & Co., nor in anywise interested therein; hence not responsible, as he humbly conceives, for the liabilities (if any) of John Forbes, over whose conduct he had no control.

And the said John Innerarity further shows to this honorable court, that it is in his power to prove, if permitted, that the motives which led to the institution of the suit whereon said decrees are founded are dishonorable in the extreme, and that they spring from considerations involving the subversion of every moral principle; and hence, that said decrees ought not to be enforced in equity and good conscience even if they had been invested with every requisite formality.

All which matters and things the said John Innerarity doth aver, and will prove, when and where to this honorable court it shall seem meet.

Attorney for John Innerarity.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Sept. 6. 1821.

This cause was brought up on the 29th day of August last, on citation served upon the defendant to attend and show cause (if any he had) why the decrees in favor of the heirs should not be carried into full effect. Statement presented to Auditors by Plaintiffs' Counsel.

Brackenridge and Call, attorneys for the heirs of Vidal against John Innerarity, submit the following statement, on behalf of the said heirs, to the auditors appointed by the Governor to adjust and settle the accounts of the estate:

John Forbes, with three others, administered on the estate at this place in June, 1806, and afterwards attached the effects at New Orleans for a debt due to his house.

Forbes became responsible for one thousand six hundred dollars purchased at the sale of effects at this place.

On the petition of Forbes, security was demanded of Armas, the executor; and from that time, we believe, the proceedings will show that the estate was placed under the control of Forbes.

The deposit was withdrawn from the treasury, and placed in the hands of Forbes; and the papers will clearly show that, as to his own debt, he always had more than its amount in his hands. The deposit in the treasury was transferred to him; and when this was applied to the payment of Arroyo's mortgage, the amount of sales at Baton Rouge was placed in his hands by way of deposit in its place. The whole proceeding shows great management, and clearly proves that the affairs of the estate were conducted pretty much at the will and pleasure of Forbes.

By a decree of September, 1806, he was ordered to raise the attachments laid on the effects in New Orleans, and proceed to make sale in the manner pointed out. With this decree he never complied. The property was sold by the sheriff, in pursuance of the improper and illegal seizure which had been made.

The last decree of 1810 recognises that of 1806, as does also that of 1820. This proves that he had never accounted, in a satisfactory manner, to the tribunal; and the probability is, that the record from New Orleans had been uniformly rejected. The property was no doubt sold at a sacrifice; the record can only furnish evidence that it was worth, at least, the amount there specified. They object to the allowance of any thing but a reasonable commission, and claim the balance, with interest from 1806. No other disbursements were, or could be, authorized by the court.

We refer the auditors to the decree of Governor Folch, in November, 1810. It is positive that Mr. Innerarity pay over to the court the amount then in his hands, having become a party, as the representative of the house of Forbes. No discretion of authority is given to make a distribution. This is evidently reserved by the court for itself.

An exact translation of that decree is important. Taken with the decree which follows, we are convinced that there can be no doubt of the intention of the court that the money should be paid into the treasury. Any payments made afterwards by Innerarity were made in his own wrong, and unauthorized; and the receipt of individuals ought to be allowed. Such appears to have been the decision of the auditor in 1820; for we cannot doubt that he refers to such when he speaks of simple private papers. That decree declares these papers to be inadmissible: they prove payments made in direct opposition to the decree. We therefore claim at least the balance remaining in the hands of Mr. Innerarity in 1810, with interest from that date, at 5 per cent.

In the account made by Leiba, there is said to be an error of $500 in favor of the estate. Domingo Sousa is acquainted with this fact. Errors of this kind can be corrected at any period.

We refer to the decree of the Governor, as confirming that of Saures. We object to the admission of any payments not expressly and specially sanctioned by the tribunals; and we contend that the record from New Orleans can prove nothing, excepting that the property sold for at least a certain amount, and may serve as evidence against the defendant as to its value.

The deposit in the hands of Mr. Innerarity is declared to be unaccounted for in 1820; as also the amount of property sold in New Orleans. The decree of 1820 required the payment of the deposit into the treasury as a preliminary to the settlement of the accounts; and that part of the decree which states that certain papers had been rejected shows that no credits were allowed, except those which appear in the testamentary papers. We object to all unauthorized payments, although it should appear that the debts have been recognised by the tribunal.

JOHN C. CONNOR,

The counsel for the heirs of Vidal except to the report of the auditors appointed to adjust and settle the accounts of the estate, for the reasons following:

1st. Because, by a positive decree passed in November, 1810, John Innerarity was expressly ordered to pay over to the tribunal the balance, amounting to $2,645, then in his hands; and no authority was given him to pay to the creditors their dividends out of this sum. They were paid by Innerarity in his own wrong, and so it was decreed by Saures in 1820. The utmost he can claim from the equity of the court is the power to compel those whom he has paid to enter satisfaction on the judicial proceedings, and for which a reasonable time may be allowed.

2d. The record from New Orleans can serve but for one single purpose—to prove the value of the property sold. By a decree of September, 1806, Forbes was expressly ordered to raise the attachments, and dispose of the effects by private sale. This decree appears to have been repeated several times in the course of the proceeding, without any alteration, down to 1810, and is also recognised by Saures, in 1820. An account of sales made in the manner forbidden by the tribunal, and a disposition of the proceeds in a manner never sanctioned, is no compliance with the decree of 1806. He is responsible for the whole amount, and with interest from the time of sale.

Statement presented to the Auditors by John Innerarity.

To the Auditors appointed by the Supreme Judicial court of West Florida for receiving and auditing the accounts against, and in favor of, the estate of the late N. M. Vidal.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

John Innerarity, in obedience to the decree of the said court, submits the following statement of the deposits of moneys belonging to said estate, and of the sums paid to the creditors thereof, to whom the same were adjudged by the judicial contador, as the dividend to which they were respectively entitled out of the funds belonging to said estate, it having been previously ascertained to be insolvent, viz :

Amount of assets declared by the tribunal to be in our hands in November, 1810, of which sum we are ordered by the said tribunal to pay - $2,645 2

To Euphrosyne Hisnard, as per her receipt herewith - - $1,379 0

To Terence Le Blanc, paid by our agent, W. Simpson, in New Orleans. - - - 209 2½

To Miguel Eslava, paid by our house in Mobile, as per our books - - - 432 0

To the clerks of the court, by order to pay Nicolet's dividend and costs, as per their receipt herewith - - - 512 0½

112 7

Amount recovered of the sheriff of New Orleans - - - $188 6

Less, cost of record herewith - - - 5 3

183 3

Amount remaining in our hands as an offset against $453½ still due, as declared by the tribunal - - - $296 2

By the above statement, it will be seen that the assets of the estate amounted to - - - - - $7,054 6½

The claims against it to - - - - - 6,101 4

And that the creditors yet have a demand against the same for - - - - - $953 2½ consequently, the estate having been unable to pay the accredited demands which had been allowed against it, there can possibly remain nothing for the legatees or heirs; and hence they have no demand against the house of Forbes. If there are any demands against that firm, it is the creditors alone who can make them. Let us examine how the matter stands with them. By the settlement of the estate in 1810, to each creditor was assigned by the judicial contador a dividend proportioned to his claim, and to the quantum of assets to meet the same; and, by a decree of the same year, found on the last page of the proceedings, this respondent, as agent of said house, was ordered to pay over the sum of $2,645½, the remainder of the deposit, to the creditors; which was done, as above shown, and by the papers herewith presented, and marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

It will be remarked that the decree above mentioned orders us to pay, after two months from the date thereof—not into the court, as Messrs. Brackenridge and Call supposed—but to pay the money; because the tribunal had no discretion over the claims of creditors in giving a longer time, (no hay arbitrio en este tribunal.)

The claims of these creditors were satisfied, as by the receipt of E. Hisnard for the share or dividend allowed her, and that of the clerks of the court for the sums allowed the persons therein mentioned, amply appears. Mr. Forbes, being recognised as the attorney of Don Miguel Eslava, of Mobile, was authorized as such to retain his share or dividend in his own hands, and to settle with him when called upon; which was done, as will appear by an inspection of the original entries in our books.

The record from New Orleans shows how the property in that city belonging to Vidal's estate was disposed of. Mr. Forbes, perceiving that the estate in Florida was not sufficient to pay the debts, brought suits before the superior court of that Territory for the recovery of so much of his debt as the goods might cover, and thus acquired a preference over other creditors as to the value of those goods, he being the first who attached them; however, they not being sufficient to pay his claim against the estate, he came in for an equal dividend of the assets in Florida, which was allowed him in the settlement of the estate by the tribunal here.

The suit being brought in New Orleans for the recovery of a just debt, due by note of hand, this tribunal could have no control over the proceedings of the court there, nor direct in whose favor the judgment should be given; hence, the order referred to by Messrs. Brackenridge and Call has no weight; and, if Mr. Forbes recovered any thing from that source independent of the other creditors, it was a good fortune, procured by his diligence in discovering property in another jurisdiction, to whose courts he had applied for justice, as far as it could be obtained from the means within their power.

It will be remarked, that this suit was defended by the executor of the estate, who seems to have been satisfied with the judgment of the court; therefore, no blame can attach to the conduct of Mr. Forbes in this particular. He was in pursuit of his claim wherever he could find property, and, with all his art and industry, did not find enough to meet his demands; so that, so far from his firm having any thing in their hands belonging to the estate of Vidal, his legal and just claims against the same remain yet unsatisfied.

All whereof is respectfully submitted.

JOHN INNERARITY.

No. 14.

To the Auditors appointed for the investigation of the accounts, &c., of the estate of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal.

GENTLEMEN: In relation to the recognition and payment of the debts due to Eslava and Le Blanc,

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

I beg leave to state, that the debt of $500 due to Eslava was first virtually recognised by the executor, Don Cristoval de Armas, as appears by the proceedings. In the various stages of those proceedings, Mr. Forbes was admitted by the tribunal as the representative of the said debt. It was further formally recognised at the judicial meeting of the creditors, and finally and definitively recognised by the tribunal itself, in the formation of the judicial account by the auditor appointed for the purpose, who assigned $432 as the pro rata share in the distribution of the assets. I repeat that Mr. Forbes acted throughout as the attorney of Eslava, and the proof of the payment is on the face of the books of John Forbes & Co. in the most authentic form; and regular mercantile books, agreeably to the Spanish laws, are admitted in all tribunals as bona fide evidence of the first grade.

The evidence of the payment of Le Blanc's debt, or the pro rata share assigned to him by the tribunal, (say $209 2½) is to be found in the books of the late William Simpson, a partner of John Forbes & Co., and who managed their establishment in New Orleans. I have not in my possession either the books or papers of the said Mr. Simpson; part of them are in New Orleans, and a part in Mobile. Had I had any anticipation of the present course of proceedings, I would have been prepared. A strong collateral proof of its payment is, that no other demand has been made of the same; and all that can be required of me is to satisfy the parties, if, by any remote contingency, we should be legally called on. Any thing beyond this would be travelling out of the record, and overstepping the rubicon of the law.

I have only further to observe, that, if any exceptions should be taken to any thing had or done touching the accounts of said estate, Messrs. Brackenridge and Call pledged themselves to my counsel, Mr. Samuel Acre, to afford me sufficient time to give him information thereof, so that he may come forward and set every thing in a legal point of view. He has also pledged himself immediately to come here, and would have remained but for his full conviction that every thing was in proper form. I doubt not that I shall be allowed the full benefit of Messrs. Brackenridge and Call's pledge, because it would be dealing very harshly with me to deprive me of the aid of my counsel, who was obliged to return on family affairs. He expressed his conviction that his return here would not be necessary, but, in the event of my giving him information of its being requisite, promised that he would come to my relief instantaneously.

One more observation, gentlemen, and I have done. You have borne testimony to the very regular and elegant manner in which the books of John Forbes & Co. appear to be kept. As to the basis of good faith on which the whole of the transactions rest, I flatter myself you cannot have a shadow of doubt. All which is most respectfully submitted by, gentlemen,

Your most obedient servant,

JOHN INNERARITY.

A true copy from the original on file in my office.

JOHN C. CONNOR,

Clerk Executive Court W. F.

To the Auditors appointed by His Excellency the Governor to investigate the accounts of the estate of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal.

GENTLEMEN: As it has recurred to my memory that some observation was incidentally made by your board in relation to the two hundred dollars paid to Mr. Livingston, it becomes my duty respectfully to state to you, that the said sum was paid by an order of court, on motion of Mr. Livingston that all the expenses, costs of court, and charges of office, should be paid, and deducted by the sheriff, and the net proceeds delivered over by him. This was done accordingly, as appears by the sheriff's account; the balance ($188 75) was paid by him into the hands of Mr. William Simpson, the partner of Mr. Forbes, and the director of his house in New Orleans. Had it been otherwise, Mr. Livingston would have applied to Mr. Simpson for his fees, and not to the sheriff.

I again beg leave to impress on your attention that the sum in question was not paid by the volition or act of Mr. Forbes, because, in my humble opinion, here the line of distinction is to be drawn. Let us examine how Mr. Forbes would be affected by another construction of this transaction—exempli gratia: Suppose it be said Mr. Forbes shall have the benefit of what was received in New Orleans, which was - - - - - $188 06
But he shall bear Mr. Livingston's charges 200 00

Difference against Mr. Forbes - - - $11 02

Thus, instead of being benefited for all his trouble, or receiving any thing from this source, he would, by this modus operandi, actually sustain a loss of $11 02. Such a recovery would be an Irreism, and such a mode of procedure an inversion of all justice; but far be it from me, gentlemen, to interfere with your province, and still further to suppose that such a course could for a moment meet your sanction. Language has no sign or equivalent to characterize such an anomaly.

This mode of stating the case is so palpably obvious, that I have to beg your pardon for thus burning candles by daylight, gratuitously discussing intuitive truth which requires no illustration.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JOHN INNERARITY.

No. 15.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS, to wit:

Be it remembered, that, on the 7th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1806, into the superior court for the Territory aforesaid, came John Forbes & Co., of Pensacola, in West Florida, by their attorney, Edward Livingston, and filed their petition in the words following, to wit:

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

To the honorable the Superior Court of the Territory of Orleans.

The petition of John Forbes & Co., of Pensacola, in West Florida, humbly sheweth: That Nicolas Maria Vidal, late auditor of war in the province of West Florida, was, at the time of his death, indebted to your petitioners in the sum of $3,361 50, for money lent, and for goods, wares, and merchandise delivered to him in his lifetime, as appears by the annexed account and affidavit. And your petitioners show that they have not been able, in West Florida aforesaid, or elsewhere out of this Territory, to discover any assets sufficient to pay or secure their said debt, but that they had been informed, and verily believe, that sundry valuable effects belonging to the said Nicolas Vidal were, previous to his departure from this place, deposited in the Ursuline convent, in this city, where the same now are. Your petitioners, humbly pray that the said effects may be seized and attached by the sheriff of the city and county of New Orleans, and that the same may be sold, according to law, to satisfy your petitioners' debt, with interest and costs. And your petitioners, &c.

EDW. LIVINGSTON,
Of counsel for plaintiffs.

Edward Livingston, attorney in fact, by substitution of John Forbes & Co., being duly sworn, doth depose and say: That he has been informed, and verily believes, that there are in the convent in this city several trunks of effects belonging to the estate of the within-named Nicolas M. Vidal, under the care of Mrs. Xavier, the superior of the said convent.

EDW. LIVINGSTON.

Upon which said petition the following endorsement was made, to wit:

"Let an attachment issue accordingly. July 7, 1806."

"J. B. PREVOST."

Here follow the documents referred to in the foregoing petition:

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seal, at Pensacola, in West Florida, this 18th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1806.

I, Greenbury Ridgely Stringer, notary public in and for the said city of New Orleans, duly commissioned, do hereby certify that I have this day carefully read and compared the foregoing written document with a certain original document purporting to be an account of sales by the late George T. Ross, as sheriff of New Orleans, dated March 24, 1807, recorded in my current register for this year at page 350, under date of this day ; and that the foregoing is a true and faithful copy of the said original, recorded as aforesaid.

No. 18.

The undersigned, auditors appointed by the supreme judicial court in the case of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal against John Innerarity, as by commission bearing date September 17, 1821, to arrange and settle the accounts of said estate, respectfully report :

That, conceiving the end of their appointment could only be attained by a strict examination of every particular from the commencement of the proceedings, they have examined the documents throughout with great care and attention, and believe they have obtained a correct knowledge of every thing connected with the subject; and believing a detailed statement would be more satisfactory to the court than any other mode, they beg leave to submit the following as the result of their investigation :

Shortly after the decease of the testator, and before a will was known to exist, an inventory was taken of the effects in this place, which were deposited in a warehouse belonging to John Forbes & Co., and were afterwards sold by Cristoval de Armas, the executor. Upon a petition of John Forbes & Co., in behalf of themselves and others, De Armas was ordered to give security, or relinquish his trust.

The above statements correspond with the judicial account formed in 1810, which is correct in every respect; and, although by it the estate appears insolvent it is evident that it would not have been so had it not been burdened with so great an amount of costs, which, including the charge for the account and the $70 reserved, amount to $1,315 5; but even with the addition of the proceeds of the property in New Orleans, there was not sufficient to discharge the mortgage without the sale of the lands.

Juan La Coste and Manuel Garcia, whose dividends together amount to $69 3, were paid, Mr. Innerarity represents, from the $70 reserved for future costs by the tribunal.

Cristoval de Armas was entitled to receive a dividend of $121, less $78 3, retained by him for his account on 2d page of this report, leaving $42 5, but received $57 50 in New Orleans; of course he was not entitled to this.

To this add the amount deducted from sales as paid Mr. Livingston, which appears to be his charge for suing out the attachment, and cannot be considered a charge against the estate	188 6

Making five hundred and one dollars and three-eighths, which the auditors unanimously find existing at this time in the hands of Mr. John Innerarity in his character of depositary, should the payments said to have been made to Eslava and Le Blanc be recognised as correct by the court.
But should the court determine the said payments to Eslava and Le Blanc to be illegal, or not properly substantiated, their accounts must be added	641 2½
	$1,142 5½
No charge is made in the account submitted by John Innerarity of five dollars and three-eighths paid for copy of record in respect to the property in New Orleans, which should be credited, and will reduce the amount absolutely stated against him to	$496 0
And the provisional amount to	$1,137 2½

Annexed to this report is a statement of the account, marked No. 1, in the form of an account current, showing the same balance of four hundred and ninety-six dollars. Also, the account submitted by Mr. John Innerarity, which is an exact copy from the books of the house, marked No. 2, stating a balance against the estate, without including the payment said to have been made to Le Blanc of $677 5½. This difference arises from the whole debt against Vidal at the time of his decease remaining charged as a matter of course; and the omission to credit the $670 assumed by them for Carrera, which it appears they have not recovered, together with $100 short credited for sale of negroes, less some small items already credited to estate by Armas, and for which they no doubt accounted with him: all which will plainly appear by reference to statement marked No. 3, which, assuming the balance of $677 5½ as a basis, and charging, in addition to the foregoing items, the $200 paid E. Livingston in New Orleans, and the difference between the actual demand of Forbes & Co. and the dividend assigned them, produce the same balance in favor of the estate—four hundred and ninety-six dollars.

Although this sum exists in the hands of Mr. Innerarity, in favor of the estate, he is entitled to receive a proportion towards the payment of four hundred and fifty-four dollars and a quarter, the difference between the actual amount due the house of John Forbes & Co., and the dividend assigned them; and, in case the payments to Eslava and Le Blanc are not allowed him, then to retain the full sum of $454 25; as the amount, in that case, would be sufficient to pay the other creditors in full.

All which is respectfully submitted to the court.

El abaxo firmado, uno de los auditores, en las diligencias de los herederos de Nicolas Ma. Vidal contra Juan Innerarity, respetuosamente expone: Que no obstante de que ha firmado el informe hecho, y que aparece en lo antecedente, difiere con los otros dos auditores en lo siguiente. En 1º lugar, en quanto á los creditos de Miguel Eslava y Terencio Le Blanc, los que halla á su juicio plenamente reconocidos, fundandose en lo que aparece en la 3a pieza, de f. 88, hta. 90, f. 133, f. 140, f. 147, hta.

En 2º lugar, que considera bien probado el pago hecho á Eslava por constar de los libros de comercio de la casa de los Señores Forbes y Ca., no hallando prueba de que se halla verificado el de la quota de Terencio Le Blanc. Que discierne ó descordo con los otros dos auditores en el cargo que se hare de los doscientos pesos pagados á Livingston, segure aparece en la cuenta del sherif de la Nueva Orleans, pues considera que arguellos justos dros que deban pagarsele deben abonarsele por cuenta de la sucesion, ignorando quales deban ser y por consiguiente qual deban ser el cargo ó abona contra uno y á favor del otro: rayado, discierne en rale.

Plea of John Innerarity.

INNERARITY vs. MERCEDES VIDAL.

The said defendant respectfully represents, that, by a decree of your Excellency, dated the 17th ultimo, (September,) he was allowed twenty days to furnish proofs in the said suit, which term does not expire until to-morrow, (Sunday, the 7th October;) and, as he hourly anxiously expects to receive material evidence from New Orleans, he throws himself on the justice of your Excellency, not to debar him from receiving the full measure of the time granted him; praying your Excellency to take into consideration the immense expense and trouble to which he has already been put in defending this suit. On Monday, the 8th, the defendant will, Deo volente, be ready to receive the traslado of the report of the auditors appointed by your Excellency's proclamation; and humbly craves that this plea may be admitted.

INNERARITY vs. MERCEDES VIDAL.

Plea.

The said defendant respectfully represents to this honorable tribunal, that, previous to the cession of these provinces, in all cases in which he was or might be concerned, he had a right of appeal; and he humbly hopes that this honorable court will not now deprive him of so sacred a right, by causing him now to appear and abide by the decision of the supreme court, en dernier resort, without his having been previously heard in a court of the first instance, agreeably to the Spanish laws, of which he claims the benefit under his Excellency's guardianship; humbly craving that this plea may be admitted.

Petition of John Innerarity, with reference to laws.

PENSACOLA, October 6, 1821.

May it please your Excellency: John Innerarity, defendant in the suit brought against him by Mercedes Vidal, respectfully represents: That he was this day, at twelve o'clock, notified to appear before your Excellency at five this afternoon, in order to hear the report of the auditors appointed by your Excellency to investigate the accounts of the estate of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal. Placing the most sacred reliance on the guaranty contained in your Excellency's proclamation when these provinces came under your ægis, he humbly hopes that your Excellency will condescend to give him a traslado of the said report, agreeably to the Spanish laws, of which he annexes to this petition such authorities as are analogous, and as the short space of time allowed would permit him to translate. He trusts that all the benefits therein set forth may be extended to him; and, as he has already suffered great expense, loss, and trouble, from the estate of Vidal and this suit, he humbly hopes that your Excellency will show towards him all the indulgence which the merits of the case may authorize. He fervently trusts that this appeal to the justice and impartiality of your Excellency will be graciously received.

As soon as the auditors shall have signed their report, it is to be delivered to the secretary, (escribano,) who consecutively certifies its delivery by the auditors, and that it is the adjustment made by them of the assets or property of the deceased; which certificate is equivalent to the intervention of the secretary at its formation.

This certificate being subscribed, it is to be annexed to the records in continuity, and the judge consecutively orders a transfer (traslado) to be given to the parties interested, for the term of three days, in order that they may make such allegations as they may deem expedient, under pain that, after the expiration of the said term, the report may be approved of, as far as conformable to law; and, after such expiration of the term of three days, which is to be given to each party interested, in order that they may avail themselves of the privilege granted to them, in case they make no allegation, or express their conformity, the judge proceeds to decree.

ARTICLE 40. When the accounts are made up, they must be presented to the judge, who is to order a transfer (traslado) of them to be given to the parties for their cognizance, in order that they may see and examine them within a certain and definite time, which he must signify to them; and after they are notified thereof, if they do not comply within the said term, after the expiration thereof the judge may approve and confirm them.

41. After the accounts are examined, within the term of examination, a transfer or sight is given to the parties, in order that, with a due knowledge of every thing relative to the case, they may follow up the proceedings in the ordinary courts until their conclusion. And it is to be observed, that the examinant or claimant of any losses on the face of the accounts, or what may be connected therewith, who is silent as to the other items, is to be held as having assented to the said items against which he has taken no exception, agreeably to the decision of Geneva and Escobas, who affirm that such is the rule.

45. After the accounts are reported on, and presented finally, the parties cannot reiterate the proceedings, or retract, unless they contain an error, and then only relative to that error, and nothing further.

Exceptions to the report of the Auditors.

INNERARITY, vs. MERCEDES VIDAL.

PENSACOLA, October 6, 1821.

John Innerarity, defendant in this suit, respectfully represents: That, inasmuch as the auditors appointed by your Excellency to investigate the accounts of the estate of Don Nicolas M. Vidal, as contained in the Spanish records, and the books and documents in possession of this defendant, have disagreed among themselves in their report, he prays that your Excellency will order and proceed therein agreeably to the Spanish laws, of which he annexes a translation (marked A.) of the most orthodox quotations therefrom, as are applicable, and the rule of action in similar cases; begging and claiming always the undeniable privilege of the traslado, as laid down in the authorities in question, in order that he may furnish the umpire, or tejer en discordia, (whether named by your Excellency or elected by the said auditors,) with such further proofs and illustrations as he may deem necessary. All which is strictly conformable to law, et in verbis legis non est recedendum.

He therefore invokes your Excellency as the guardian of the laws in your executive capacity.

Curia Felipica, page 401, art. 36.

If there shall be any disagreement between the auditors, the judge shall name an umpire, who must give his opinion only as relates to the matter wherein they do not agree. And the parties concerned must be duly notified of the nomination, in order that they may lay before him such information as they may deem necessary. And, although both parties should concur and be satisfied with the nomination for settling the difference and contrariety between the auditors, he (el tejer en discordia) ought to confine himself to the opinion of one or the other auditor, without making any deviation therefrom. But if he should be appointed by the judge, he may deviate from the opinion of either, because it is his duty to make his report agreeably to law.

The costs to the auditors and umpire must be paid equally by both parties, as well by the one as by the other; and the judge is to tax what he thinks reasonable.

If it should appear that the contadores appointed do not agree in opinion, they can, according to law, be compelled to elect an umpire. Although there is no doubt of this, it has been thought proper, and it is the practice of the courts, for the judge to name one officially, in order to avoid the disputes which might accrue between them as to the election. And although two of the three should agree, yet the traslado, or transfer of the proceedings to the parties concerned, must not be omitted, in order that they may either consent or set forth their wrongs; and they must be heard in the ordinary courts, because the judge cannot proceed to pronounce summarily until the formalities of the law be complied with; because the parties must be heard fully; the proofs which they may produce must be weighed, in order to ascertain whether the wrongs on the grounds which they allege have any existence in reality. The judge can then pronounce sentence, from which an appeal may be taken within five days.

Plea of John Innerarity.

PENSACOLA, MONDAY, Oct. 8, 1821.

May it please your Excellency: John Innerarity, defendant in the suit instituted against him by Mercedes Vidal, begs leave most respectfully to state, that the twenty days granted to said defendant for furnishing proofs to the auditors appointed by your Excellency expire to-day, and the term of traslado, or transfer of the proceedings in corpore, for taking exceptions to the report of the said auditors, and showing the legality of the evidence furnished, or any other benefit granted by the laws, will consecutively commence so soon as your Excellency may pass the necessary decree for this purpose. This is the uniform march, or modus operandi, of the Spanish law, as the defendant has shown from the latest and most orthodox authorities cited in the pleas and memorial presented to your Excellency. That admirable code, the Laws of the Indies, states, also, (tom. 3, lex 1, tit. 16, under the head of "term for pronouncing sentence when every requisite is concluded,") that, when all the arguments are finally closed, and every formality complied with, the judge gives until six days to pronounce an interlocutory, and until twenty a definitive sentence. The defendant again entreats and implores that these sacred oracles may not be disregarded or overruled. These are the laws in which he has been nurtured. Hic bonus esse. They lead to safety and security. They are a pavilion in the time of danger, and the defendant's only refuge in the hour of need. Your Excellency's proclamation solemnly guaranties the boon of the continuance of the Spanish laws; it is a pledge too precious to be parted with; it is the plank to which the defendant clings when he sees all the elements warring around him. It is his ark of safety, a sanctuary in the season of distress. He is now in that extremity. He has been told by your Excellency that you sit as his judge in the first instance, and en dernier resort, ne plus ultra, without any other resource or means of redress, inasmuch as all power is combined in your Excellency.

The defendant humbly hopes that he will be permitted to say, with all possible respect, that such a situation is critical, nay, awful indeed! It is without a solitary precedent in modern annals; at least, if they do furnish one, it is far beyond his ken, or the utmost range of his reading or experience. He is not even allowed time to call his counsel. He is, in a word, without hope, without confidence, except as to the justice of his exceptions to the report, which he will make if he is granted the privilege of the law; and, if not, then he must yield to force; in which case, he most respectfully begs that this may be considered as his reverential protest. It is under all these alarms, and under circumstances of far greater weight than any which he has hitherto mentioned, but which, through profound respect to your Excellency, remain enshrined in his own bosom, that he most humbly approaches your Excellency, fervently praying that this appeal may be graciously received.

HEIRS OF VIDAL vs. JOHN INNERARITY.

The report of the auditors in this case displays great skill and judgment, and the court are highly satisfied with it. Although, in a strictly legal point of view, vouchers may have been received, and credits allowed, which could not be warranted by the strict letter of the law; yet, from the apparently great attention devoted by them to the subjects submitted to their investigation, and after examination of the report, it is believed by the court that substantial justice may be done by carrying it into effect, especially as the counsel for the plaintiffs have withdrawn their legal exceptions.

The auditors, in the first place, unanimously find a balance of $496 in the hands of the defendant as a deposit, and submit the question to the court whether there is sufficient evidence to allow the payments said to have been made to Eslava and Le Blanc; and if the court should be of opinion that there is not sufficient evidence, then the amount of $641 31 to be added to the sum of $496 absolutely found, making altogether the sum of $1,137 31.

The court are perfectly satisfied that there is not sufficient legal evidence to allow the payments said to have been made to Eslava and Le Blanc, and therefore adopt the provisional amount specified in the report, to wit, $1,137 31.

The court further adopt and allow that part of the report which states that, if the court do not allow the payments said to have been made to Eslava and Le Blanc, to suffer the defendant to retain in his hands the full sum of $454 25, it being the full amount of the balance due the house of Forbes & Co., as the amount, in that case, would be sufficient to pay all the creditors, which will leave a balance of $683 06. As to the exceptions of the defendant to the report, the court do not think them well taken. The first is, that the auditors did not allow the $200 paid to Mr. Livingston, as a fee for suing out an attachment against the effects of Vidal. The court are of opinion that the auditors acted rightly in not allowing this charge; for it appears that the attachment was taken out after the will was duly proved by De Armas, the executor, and, consequently, could not lie; which was virtually the decision of the court to which we have succeeded.

The other exception, that the auditors ought to have allowed the payments said to have been made to Eslava and Le Blanc, the court have already, in the first part of this opinion, disposed of.

To the amount of $683 06, is to be added legal interest, according to the laws of Spain, to wit, five per centum per annum, from the 20th day of November, 1810, the time that the money ought to have been paid over by Forbes & Co., in compliance with a decree of the Spanish tribunal of that date, making the sum of $1,027 19.

Therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that John Innerarity, the defendant, pay over to the alcalde of the city of Pensacola, in thirty days from this day, the said sum of $1,027 19, and, in case of his failure to comply, execution may issue at the expiration of said thirty days, and the money made to be paid over into the hands of the alcalde of the city of Pensacola. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said alcalde must give public notice in the Floridian, for the term of sixty days, to the creditors of the estate of Vidal, deceased, to come forward, make known their claims, and receive the amount; and if no creditors should come forward within the time limited, or, after having come forward, fail legally to substantiate their claims, then the said alcalde is required to pay over the money in his hands to the heirs of Vidal.

Given under our hands, this 8th day of October, 1821, and of the independence of the United States the forty-sixth.

JOHN C. MITCHELL,
ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

The court, being informed that H. Bigelow, Esq., is indisposed, appoint Mr. Shannon to tax the costs of the former and these proceedings, from the filing of the petitions of the heirs of Vidal in this court to this date; and that the defendant is hereby decreed to pay the same; and if he fails, after due notice in writing of the costs taxed, that execution issue for the same.

Given under our hands, at Pensacola, in the Executive Chamber, this 8th day of October, 1821.

JOHN C. MITCHELL,
ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

Attest: JOHN C. CONNOR,
Clerk of the Executive Court.

No. 24.

Extract from the Spanish records in the case of Vidal's estate.

On the 25th of May, 1806, Nicolas Maria Vidal, auditor of war in Pensacola, died suddenly. Colonel Folch, then Governor of the province, caused the necessary seals immediately to be affixed, inventories to be made, and all other requisite formalities to be practised as ab intestato, as no will was found among his papers.

On the 30th June of the same year, (1806,) Cristoval de Armas presented himself in Pensacola, and exhibited to the military tribunal a will of the deceased, made in New Orleans on the 4th of May, 1798, before Peter Pedesciang, notary public, in which he recognises and names as his natural heiresses, in the event of there being any thing to divide after the payment of his debts, four natural daughters; two of whom he had in Carthagena, one by a negro woman, and the other by a mulatto woman; and two in New Orleans, by a mulatto woman named Euphrosyne Hisnard. He names the said Cristoval his executor and administrator, with power to act without judicial intervention, and to sell his effects, realize his property, and pay his debts. This will was declared valid by the court in New Orleans, and also by the military tribunal of Pensacola, which accordingly granted letters of administration to the said Cristoval. He immediately proceeded to the appraisement and sale of the effects of the deceased, which were already inventoried. He examined, recognised, and declared valid all the notes and obligations of the deceased; as, also, the accounts against the estate presented by the different creditors; of all which the original Spanish proceedings contain the most detailed evidence.

On the 18th of September, 1806, Mr. J. Forbes petitioned, in his own name, and that of the other creditors, for the sale of sixteen thousand arpents of land situated in the district of Baton Rouge, declared in the will to be mortgaged to Francisco Gutierrez de Arroyo, for the payment of $4,000, and, inasmuch as the said Cristoval resided in a foreign country, that he might be ordered to give security, or deposit the amount of the effects sold. After some time, Cristoval applied to the tribunal to be exonerated from the charge of executor, which was granted. The tribunal considered it useless to name another administrator, as it was then ascertained that the estate was insolvent. The creditors continued acting and petitioning, each in his own behalf, although the court had decreed a meeting of creditors to treat and determine on every thing relative to the estate.

A meeting afterwards took place, at the request of the representative of the minors, for the special purpose of treating of the sale of the lands at Baton Rouge. They had been previously sold for cash. But, on the urgent remonstrances of the representative of the minors, the tribunal decreed the nullity of the sale, and ordered that they should be sold in fractions, and at one year's credit. A new sale accordingly took place. During the interval carrying into effect the decision of the court, Arroyo petitioned that the mortgage which he held for $4,000 should be paid in preference to the other creditors; which was accordingly done out of the moneys in deposit, in order to release the lands from this encumbrance; and Arroyo, in consequence, cancelled the mortgage.

In the meantime, Mr. Simpson, the agent of Mr. Forbes in New Orleans, having discovered some property there belonging to Vidal, had recovered, by a decree of the superior court of the Territory of Orleans, (a foreign country, in 1806, with respect to Pensacola,) the sum of $188. When the lands were sold, and after the terms of credit had expired, Mr. Forbes, in the name of the creditors, solicited the tribunal in Pensacola to authorize him to claim and to receive the sums for which the lands had been sold, and he accordingly received $4,129, the total amount thereof; and this sum was deposited with him until the formation of the accounts of the assets, and the pro rata share was assigned to each of the creditors by the judicial accountant appointed by the tribunal.

By the order of the tribunal, and agreeably to the judicial account, the pro rata shares were paid to the creditors, in obedience to the decree marked No. 1, receipts given, and the business considered at an end. Mr. Forbes, it appears, had no more agency throughout than as one of the creditors and as depositary of the funds of an insolvent estate. He neither claimed nor received any commission.

Things remained in that situation until, it seems, some time in 1817, a petition was filed by one of the minors to recover the original papers.

On the 20th of June, 1820, another petition was filed, by Mercedes Vidal, in her own name, and as agent of her sister Caroline, impugning the proceedings of the tribunal by whose order the estate of Vidal had been settled, and requiring John Innerarity, as attorney of the former house of John Forbes & Co., to furnish a statement of the accounts, &c., as may be seen by a reference to the petition itself, and the decree accompanying it. This decree, although purporting to have been notified to, and even to be signed by, the said John Innerarity, has never been notified to him, and is not signed by him, as may be ascertained by consulting the document No. 2.

This petition was followed by another, at the foot of which we find a decree which has been permitted to lie dormant from the 11th of August, 1820, until the 29th of August, 1821, without ever being notified to either party. In the mean time, auditor Suares, who had rendered those decrees, returned himself the whole of the proceedings to be packed up with the other military papers, to be delivered to the superior military tribunal at Havana, under the custody and responsibility of the military Governor of this province, and then left this country. General Jackson, &c. Cetera desunt. Utinam!

XII.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, December 2, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving, last night, your letter of the 26th of October.

That the President is pleased to be persuaded that my motives and intentions were entirely pure, requires from me, as an individual, the most heartfelt gratitude. In any other official situation but that of a judge, my duty ought, perhaps, to be confined to the simple expression of that gratitude. But, under my present circumstances, I humbly presume that I may be permitted not to disregard the important obligations which I conceive devolve on me as judge of the United States for West Florida. The necessity of settling, as far as in my power lies, subject to the control of higher authority, the abstract principle of right or wrong, not less than a due regard for the individuals, both the old and new inhabitants of West Florida, whose rights to their liberty and property are guaranteed by the treaty, and who are deprived, some of their liberty, others of their property, by what I conceive the arbitrary and unauthorized judgment of incompetent tribunals, calls upon me most imperiously again to enter into the most minute investigation of the organization of the several courts of justice, which have assumed in West Florida a jurisdiction which I deem illegal, whether that illegality proceeds from a misinterpretation of powers conferred by the President; or from the illegality of the powers themselves, although actually given by the President; or from the unconstitutionality in some of the provisions of the act itself, in virtue of which the President granted those powers.

My very high respect for the President and for yourself does not permit me to send you, this day, a hasty, indigested sketch, upon a question of so much importance to the people of this country, and, indeed, to the United States at large, and in which it is now my misfortune to differ in opinion with men with whom it would be my pride at all times to agree. What my opinion now is, and the reasons upon which that opinion is grounded, I fairly and candidly state sparsim in several of my preceding communications. What, after a thorough investigation of the whole subject, my opinion will be, I will likewise state with the same frankness; and, whatever may be the result of that re-examination, I hope it will be received with an indulgence equal to the very profound respect with which it is offered.

On the 29th ultimo, the United States ship Hornet, Captain Robert Henley, with her prize the brig Centinella, carrying sixteen guns, arrived at Pensacola. Captain Henley communicated to me all the circumstances connected with the capture by him of the brig Centinella, and of the briganttine La Pensée, a prize to the Centinella, having on board two hundred and forty Africans. Why I declined assuming jurisdiction in these cases, you will see by a reference to my letter to Captain Henley, written before I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 26th of October; a copy of which letter, together with a copy of the letter of Captain Henley to me, I have the honor of sending you, enclosed. My declining to assume jurisdiction in this case has created here not a little excitement. My doing too little now, as they think, has subjected me to the same acerbity of reproach as my doing too much, as they conceived, on another occasion; and, no wonder; although the cases are different, the motives for displeasure in both cases are the same.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

[Enclosure in XII.]

Mr. Fromentin to Captain Henley.

PENSACOLA, Dec. 1, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with the desire expressed to me in your letter of this morning, I have no hesitation in giving you, in writing, the reasons by which I am induced to decline assuming jurisdiction in the case of the brig Centinella, a prize to the Hornet, and of the provisions on board of her.

The act of Congress for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain has extended to the territories of West Florida the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, and the laws relating to the importation of persons of color; by which word importation, I must understand importation within the limits of West Florida, and that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape. This is not the crime for which the Centinella was captured by you, and brought in for adjudication. I understand from you that the captain and crew of the Centinella have been brought in by you as guilty of the crime of piracy, committed in or near Cumberland harbor, in the island of Cuba. Had the crime of piracy, connected with and inseparable from the act of importation of people of color, been committed within the limits of the jurisdiction assigned to me by my commission, the question would have been different; but it is not now necessary to examine that point. In the present case, I am satisfied that, under the provision of the act of Congress above recited, extending to the ceded territories the laws relating to the importation of persons of color, I have no jurisdiction.

How can I claim and assume jurisdiction in virtue of the Spanish laws declared to be still in force in this country, under the general judicial powers vested in me by the above-recited act, and by my commission under it? If no other consideration should induce me to hesitate, the summary mode of proceedings prescribed by the Spanish laws in cases of piracy does not agree with my idea of the obligations imposed upon a judge of the United States in a trial for a capital offence; and, under my full conviction that (the act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, by which the Spanish laws are maintained in force) all the laws of Spain which are in manifest opposition with the security warranted to the accused by the Constitution of the United States cannot be included in the catalogue of the Spanish laws remaining in force in this country, (because Congress, not having the right to pass laws abridging that security, cannot of course have the right to adopt or maintain those laws, not for half an hour, much less for months, in any part of a territory become a part of the United States,) I could not reconcile it to myself, under any circumstances, to apply the principles of the Spanish laws to the case of the Centinella and her crew. Besides, if ever I had jurisdiction, I could not now exercise it. There is in Pensacola neither a marshal nor attorney of the United States. What irresponsible officer, if the law did allow it, ought, or would be willing, to take it upon himself to secure one hundred and twenty men accused of a capital crime, in a place which does not afford the means of properly securing a dozen petty offenders?

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the Centinella ought to be sent, without delay, to New Orleans; that an express be sent immediately, either by land or by water, to Commodore Patterson, in New Orleans, to desire him to send down to the Balize a ship or steamboat, with a sufficient guard to receive the prisoners now on board the Centinella; or to send a sufficient number of men to man the Centinella, if she can be got over the bar; so that the officers and men of the Hornet, now on board of the Centinella, may be returned, without delay, on board of the Hornet. It will be necessary that either yourself, or some of the officers of the Hornet, thoroughly and legally acquainted with all the facts, should go at the same time with the Centinella to New Orleans, in order there to give the information to the attorney for the district of Louisiana, and to make the necessary affidavits, &c.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

ROBERT HENLEY, Esq.,

Of the United States ship Hornet.

XIII.

Judge Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, December 9, 1821.

SIR: In compliance with the engagement in my last letter to you, dated the 2d instant, I have the honor of sending to you, enclosed, an exposition of my motives for still adhering to the construction I originally gave to the act for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain.

If, after the serious, and, I may fairly add, disinterested re-examination of this question, I have come still to a wrong conclusion, I ought not to dissemble from you my stubborn incapacity. I am unwilling to be valued more than I am worth.

I will not add, either by unfounded pretensions, or by a system of studied concealment of the reasons by which I act, to the number of swindlers of reputation.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Exposition, &c.

In expounding a law, I deem it all-important to ascertain, if practicable, the motives of the Legislature in enacting it. This once done, the construction of the law is stripped of all its difficulties.

The act for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain does not admit, in its construction, of the slightest doubt. The Legislature itself declares, in the second section of the act, that it has created certain offices for maintaining the people of the ceded Territories in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion, in conformity with the clause in the sixth article of the treaty, which secures to those people the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights and immunities of citizens of the United States.

Now, where shall I look for those privileges, rights, and immunities? In the only place in which they are to be found—in the Constitution of the United States. But here I am to be stopped at once. The Constitution is not, I am to be told, extended in express terms to the Floridas; and it is not to be construed as being extended by implication. But does the act of Congress create, in express terms, the office of Captain General of the island of Cuba? Does it create that office even by implication? and, if it did, is it only the doctrine of oppression which is to be received, in a country under the Government of the United States, by implication? Are a Captain General of the island of Cuba, a Governor of the same island, an Intendant, a Supreme Judge, &c., with whose undefined duties and authority (that prolific nurse of despotism) no person in the United States, it seems, was acquainted, to be unblushingly smuggled into the Floridas under the auspices of the star-spangled banner? And when, in obedience to the imperious call made upon him by the same act, the valiant, the legitimate knight of American liberty, the bold asserter of American freedom, the writ of habeas corpus, presents himself, he is to be refused admittance: Away, away! We know him not. Crucify! crucify! Yes, sir, if in this most sacred cause, (sacred next to the cause of religion itself,) I may be allowed to use the words of the Scripture, "He came unto his own, and his own received him not."

Great, no doubt, and imposing, are the names of some by whom that doctrine is advocated. But still, both in my judicial capacity, and in my character of an American citizen, I must beg leave, most respectfully, but most unequivocally, to protest against the liberticidal doctrinal.

Sir, the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba had no duty to perform in the Floridas, except a sort of general honorary rather than efficient right of superintendence, in receiving in their capacity of superior military officers, occasional reports from the Governors of the two provinces of Florida, and making their report accordingly to their Government; which general duty of superintendence, from the moment of the transfer of the Floridas, I humbly presume, necessarily devolved on the administration of the Federal Government. You, sir, in that respect, are the proper Captain General of the island of Cuba. This duty of superintendence, with the occasional obligation of appointing temporarily a Governor in either of the two provinces of Florida, in case of the death or other disability of either of the incumbents, constituted the whole of the authority of the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba over these provinces. Unless, then, it can be contended that the Captain General and Governor of Cuba was appointed for the purpose of enabling the Governor of the Floridas to report to himself as Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, or after his death to appoint another Governor in his place, it is impossible for me to conceive what we have to do here with a Captain General of the island of Cuba.

The duty of the Intendant of the island of Cuba is confined to the superintendence of the royal revenues, and to the management of the royal domains. But, in this same commission, which creates General Jackson Intendant of the island of Cuba, he is expressly prohibited from interfering with either the revenue or the dominions of the United States; thus, it seems, we have no more to do with the Intendant than with either the Captain General or Governor of the island of Cuba.

However, deriving, as General Jackson does, his high judicial authority from his title of Captain General of the island of Cuba, let us see how these pretensions agree with the Spanish law on the subject. Under the old form of government, the Captain General of Cuba was ex officio president of the real audiencia, sitting at Port Principe, in the island of Cuba, where, I believe, he never attended. But, if he had attended in his capacity as president, he only had the casting vote in case of an equal division of the judges, not less than fifty or sixty in number. But that right of presidency ex officio (a mere honorary right) did not vest in him, to be exercised singly, a particle of judicial authority in civil or criminal matters. Except when on that bench, he neither claimed nor exercised any judicial functions but in military matters, where he presided in the court of appeals in Havana. This, so far as respects the judicial functions of the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, was the state of things under the old government of Spain. Things have been radically changed by the proclamation of the new constitution of Spain, in the Spring of 1820, both in Havana and in Pensacola. Under the new constitution, both the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, and the Governors of the two provinces of East and West Florida, who, with the assistance of the auditor of war, exercised, under the old form of government, each in their respective provinces, judicial functions, have been deprived of all judicial authority, except in military affairs; and those duties are now to be discharged by judges expressly appointed for that purpose. Upon what foundation, then, does General Jackson rest his claim to the high dignity of a supreme judge, a chancellor, &c.? which high offices, it seems he would give us to understand, have been smuggled in the same package with the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba.

It is, then, very evident that General Jackson, under his commission as Captain General &c., of the island of Cuba, cannot claim and exercise in this country any judicial authority. This ought to be a sufficient answer to General Jackson himself, who, ostensibly at least, does not claim any judicial power but under his commission as Captain General of Cuba. But let us examine that question further, and see whether, under the act of Congress for carrying the treaty into effect, he cannot possibly be vested by the President, in virtue of an additional commission, which nobody has seen, with judicial powers.

The act for carrying the treaty into effect says that the "military, civil, and judicial powers shall be vested in such person and persons," &c. Let us then inquire, first, whether, under that law, he can be vested with the judicial authority; for if he cannot be, we must necessarily conclude that he is not: and if, notwithstanding under the law he could not be vested with those powers, still it should turn out that he was vested with them, the result would be the same: the appointment would be an illegal one, and, of course, null and void; and, in my judicial capacity, I should feel bound to resist it.

Now, then, was the civil power, as contradistinguished from the judicial power, vested in General Jackson? Most indubitably. You would laugh at me if I were seriously to ask whether the military power was vested in him—I mean whether he exercised it; for whether vested or not, if he exercised it, my argument holds equally good; the object of the act of Congress being to prohibit the exercise of those three powers by the same person. Whence it follows, evidently, that the judicial power could not be vested in him; or, if it was, it was vested improperly; and I deem it my duty to consider it as not vested at all.

So far, then, as respects any judicial powers exercised in the Floridas by General Jackson himself, I have no hesitation in pronouncing them—no matter in virtue of what commission he may contend he had a right to exercise those powers—a usurpation, not only not warranted, but expressly prohibited, by the act for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain.

Another question, and a most important one, is now to be examined. Is there in the law any authority, which, by the most far-fetched mode of reasoning, can be construed so as to vest in him, or to authorize the President to vest in him, legislative powers; and thus to authorize him to create courts of justice, to assign them a jurisdiction unknown in the country, and to give him the right to vest in others any judicial authority—any authority differing essentially from the authority exercised by the officers of the existing government of the ceded territories?

Those rights, then, not being explicitly given, recourse must be had to this, in favor of oppression, only favorably-to-be-received doctrine of right by implication. Again we must draw upon this inexhaustible Captain General and Governor of Cuba, &c. But even that resource fails. Neither under the old Government of Spain, nor under the present Spanish constitution, has the Captain General, or any of his twin brother officers, all incorporated in the person of General Jackson, ever had the right of creating a court of justice. If, then, the right of creating a court of justice be not derived from the powers appertaining to the Captain General of Cuba, &c., whence is that right derived? Certainly not from the act of Congress, which, so far as respects judicial powers, vested in the President alone the right of appointing a judge, who is to be a different person from the civil and military officer or officers, and who is to exercise his duty in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct. Now, all this has been done. The President has done me the honor to appoint me, and in my commission he has prescribed the manner in which I am to execute my duty. The law is satisfied.

I have, I think, demonstrated above, that the law did not authorize the President to confer any legislative powers upon General Jackson. On the other hand, (which, by-the-by, would by no means alter the illegality of the trust,) those legislative powers assumed by General Jackson cannot be traced to even the illegitimate source of any legislative powers enjoyed either under the old Government of Spain, or under the present Spanish constitution, by any of the many offices, the rights and duties of which General Jackson conceives did centre in him. The creation of this court, then, is an unwarranted assumption of undelegated powers; and the persons who pretend to sit as judges under the appointment of General Jackson are guilty of usurpation, and, under the laws by which this country is at present governed, responsible to the parties in damages.

There is, sir, a particular feature in this transaction, which, if I understand your letter correctly, strikes me, and I am sure must, upon reflection, strike both the President and yourself, as a most extraordinary one. When I first was informed that the President had done me the honor of conferring on me the appointment of judge of the United States for West Florida, I was induced to give to myself an account of the probable motives of the selection made of me; and, understanding that the Spanish laws were provisionally maintained, I came to the conclusion that the President had deemed it proper and convenient to select, for administering the Spanish laws in Pensacola, a judge from among the members of the bar of a country where the same laws, so far as they are not contrary to, or repugnant with, the Constitution of the United States, are still in force, and who, of course, was supposed to be acquainted with those laws which he was to administer. An additional motive, perhaps, I thought, in appointing me (a stranger by birth) to that high office, in a country which, I am sure, it was the intention of the President to conciliate, might have been to satisfy the people of that country, by my example, that the promises held out to naturalized citizens by our free Constitution were not vain and empty promises, but real substantial benefits and advantages, which the extreme liberality of our political institutions threw open to them as well as to the natives of the United States, from the moment that the Government of the United States, by taking possession of the Floridas, had recognised them as citizens of the free American Republic.

Judge, then, sir, what must have been my astonishment, when I read in your letter that the general commission sent me is considered and intended to apply only to the execution of the laws respecting the revenue and the importation of people of color! and that the President considered it his duty to intrust the execution of the Spanish laws, declared to be still in force in this country, to officers specially appointed for that purpose! I am lost in amazement. What officers have been specially appointed for the purpose? None have been appointed by the President. General Jackson, I have proved, had not the right to appoint any; and yet now Pensacola exhibits the strange, very strange spectacle, indeed, of a court of unlimited jurisdiction in both civil and criminal matters; of a court without the assistance of a jury in civil matters; of a court without appeal—which court consists of three or four men, professedly not understanding a word of the language in which the laws which they are sworn to administer are written; men who have never before lived under the administration of those laws, and not prepared, by a previous education, to draw the information they are deficient in from the original sources in the Latin language, from which many of those laws are derived. Good and true men, sir, who indubitably mean well. But still, sir, suppose them angels: is not their ignorance of the language in which the laws are written an insuperable bar to their appointment? Only think, sir, of the Governors of Virginia and Massachusetts appointing as judges of a court of unlimited jurisdiction, without appeal, four Spaniards entirely unacquainted with the language in which the laws of Massachusetts and Virginia are written! Or, indeed, if this appears to you rather too shocking, suppose the Governor of Pennsylvania should appoint to administer the laws in Philadelphia four Germans from the county of Lancaster, who do not understand a word of the English language! You smile at the comparison; yet let the difference be pointed out. Is this justice, sir? Is it not, on the contrary, the prostration of all justice? There must be some misunderstanding. I cannot believe, sir, that the President or yourself can be acquainted with the facts which I have detailed. It cannot be, sir, that the administration of the Government of the United States can sanction such proceedings. The American people will shudder when they hear of it; and posterity, disposed always to believe almost every thing, will refuse to believe that. The more I reflect on the subject, the more I am bewildered; and yet, if General Jackson had a commission from the President authorizing him to act as he has done, how is it, since he thought proper to exhibit another commission, that that commission was not exhibited by him on the occasion of the celebrated question of jurisdiction in the case of the heirs of Vidal vs. Innerarity? Why, on that occasion, exhibit a commission under which he certainly can claim no part of the extraordinary judicial powers which he has exercised here? Why the many elaborate efforts to establish, by unavailing reasonings and by false facts, a jurisdiction, which even an illegal and unconstitutional commission, if he had exhibited it, would have established so as to answer, at all events, all his then purposes? Sir, has the generous zeal of the President betrayed him, in order to save a man who once , but who now, I fear, cannot be saved except by the sacrifice of the country, in now assuming upon himself a heavier responsibility than he has really incurred? I hope the suggestion may be forgiven. It would be the fanaticism of charity, and Mr. Monroe will pardon me for believing that he is capable of it.

The question, however, in any state of things, still recurs: Are the judicial powers exercised by General Jackson in West Florida, either by himself, or by persons appointed by him, (no matter from what source they spring,) legal powers? To that question, after the most solemn and dispassionate examination of the case, my conscience answers—no. As long, then, as I shall be permitted to retain the commission with which I have been honored by the President, I must continue to consider myself as the only judge in Pensacola. Indeed, every appointment to a judicial office in West Florida, anterior to mine, derived from a commission for particular purposes from the President, I must consider as entirely superseded by my commission, which is expressed in the most general terms, and which commission is predicated upon an act of Congress, recognising in the Floridas the existence of a particular code of laws, which it would be strange, indeed, if a general and unlimited commission under that very act should not reach.

I hope, sir, my zealous examination of, and the earnest and free expression of my sentiments on, this question, will not be attributed by you to motives taking their impure source in committed or disappointed self-love. No, sir; self, I assure you, has never been further from me than, since I am in Pensacola, in almost every stage of this very extraordinary, and to me very disagreeable business; self would have dictated a line of conduct very different from the line I pursued. I consider this question only with reference to the rights secured to the people of this country by the treaty, and to the obligations assumed by the Government towards those people by the same treaty.

When I reflect that not less than one hundred suits, both civil and criminal, have been already tried—tried? no; I ought to have said decided—by the court appointed here by General Jackson, I am struck with terror at the rapidity of the torrent of endless litigation which is likely to overwhelm in a common ruin the honest citizens of this country, who have not been the victims of the other tyrannical measures pursued here by General Jackson. And can this be the accomplishment of the expectations held out by a law expressly passed for maintaining the inhabitants of the ceded territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion?

Sir, conscious, as from what precedes you must be sensible I am, that the President has no right to constitute a North court, such as existed in Great Britain under Charles I.; or a court of exchequer, which I do not conceive created by a law which I understand as giving (as is done every day) jurisdiction in matters of revenue to a court created for the general purposes of a court of justice in the United States; or a prevotal court, such as was occasionally established in France; and that the words of the section of the act, "and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct," cannot relate but to the manner of exercising the given powers, not to the right of vesting those powers; that the words of the law are intended to prevent the continuation of possible abuses supposed to exist, not to create new and unheard-of abuses—that, for instance, with respect to the judiciary, if a practice had prevailed, as many persons supposed it still did, of taking the evidence of witnesses in private, the President should, under that clause of the law, direct it to be taken in open court; conscious, further, that if, per impossibile, the President could originally claim the right, under the words of the act I have quoted, of dividing the judicial duties to be performed, some by some under the Spanish laws, others by others under the two acts of Congress mentioned in the law, yet, after giving a general commission which embraces the Constitution and the laws of the United States, (of which laws the act for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain, under which I am appointed, is one,) the President cannot have the right afterwards of abridging that jurisdiction—I am bound, and, of course, must here declare, with unfeigned and profound respect, my determination to maintain the right vested in me of administering here the laws of Spain, which, being neither in opposition to nor repugnant with the Constitution of the United States, are still in force in the Floridas; and, under the powers thus vested in me, since the right is refused to introduce the writ of habeas corpus in the Floridas under the protection of the American, I will introduce it under the protection of the Spanish constitution.

Flectere si nequos superos, Acheronta movebo. I regret it, sir—bitterly regret it; the Genius of American history will drop a tear in penning the page which is to record this singular political phenomenon. But if the people of the Floridas cannot be protected in their liberty and property, as of right they ought to be, by the Constitution of our country—by the constitution of their country—they shall be protected, as far at least as my weak powers may avail them, by the constitution of Spain—by the constitution of their former country. Give me leave, sir, to refer you to the 11th section of the 172d article of the Spanish constitution; and further, among many others containing an analogous doctrine, to the articles 247, 251, 254, 287, 295, 299, 306, 312, and 371 of the same instrument.

By these several articles, sir, as fundamental laws still in force here, mutatis mutandis, test the conduct of General Jackson here; and, instead of making him simply a Captain General of the island of Cuba, &c., suppose him King of all the Spains, if you will; and even then he must be crushed under the ponderous weight of the loudly accusing authorities against his unprecedented despotism; and by the same authorities I must be supported in my strenuous exertions to screen the victims of his fury. And whether I used, in order to enforce my authority, the forms of what we call in the United States a writ of habeas corpus, or whether I issued any other order which a Spanish judge might have issued under similar circumstances, for the purpose of obtaining the same end, I feel, and I sincerely hope, sir, the President and yourself will, upon reconsideration, feel satisfied, likewise, that I have done every thing in my power to enforce obedience to the law, and that, in doing so, I have not gone beyond, but have kept myself strictly within, the limits of the legitimate authority intrusted to me by the President.

Sir, this communication being likely to close our correspondence on the subject of the difficulty between General Jackson and myself, (believing, as I do, that Congress will have legislated for the Floridas probably before this reaches you,) it may not be improper, perhaps, for me to add here a few observations in support and in vindication of the severe language I have been compelled to use in speaking of the conduct here of General Jackson. Sir, I am no miniature, no water-color painter. What I strongly feel, I must express strongly; and, accordingly, I reflect with pride on the strong expressions of gratitude which, in common with every American citizen, I bestowed on the achievements of General Jackson. Not one of the members with whom I had the honor to serve in the Senate of the United States will accuse me of having been deficient, so far as my feeble, very feeble, exertions and my vote could go, in the manifestation, in every possible shape and form, of the national gratitude to the man in particular under whose auspices the British had been obliged disgracefully to withdraw from the shores of invaded Louisiana.

When, on a later occasion, General Jackson made himself amenable to the severity of the laws of his country, for the perpetration of crimes—the forerunners of the crimes which he has since committed here—the measure of my gratitude to the conqueror at New Orleans was not yet exhausted. I rejoiced in my heart that the tribunal before which he was arraigned, and of which I was a member, could not, in my opinion, constitutionally take cognizance of the crimes with which he was charged; and thus, reconciling the imperious obligations of my conscience with the next to that imperious duty of my gratitude to the man who had rendered an essential service to my country, upon the ground of want of jurisdiction, I was found in the foremost ranks, and, if not among the ablest, I am sure among the most zealous, defenders of General Jackson.

Ever since, both in my public and private character, General Jackson's name was never pronounced by me but with the high respect his past services called for. I was proud to be associated with him in the pleasing and honorable task of initiating our new brethren of the Floridas into the enjoyment of the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

Even, sir, since my arrival in Pensacola, although a more intimate acquaintance with the man, whom I knew before principally from the rumors of fame, had, in a great measure, sunk the hero; notwithstanding I had heard his frequent imprecations, and his repeated determination to rule by the bayonet—by the bayonet!—a people the most devoted, the most honest, the most inoffensive—of not one of whom, during his stay here, I venture to assert, he had the slightest reason to complain, and in point of numbers, too, the most insignificant; still, such was my blind infatuation, that, contrary to the dictates of my sounder judgment, my gratitude took the lead, and succeeded in persuading me that such language, improper as it was, was nothing more than the evaporating ebullitions of an overboiling temper, which never were to be followed by any dangerous results.

What, then, must have been the conduct of the man who, in spite of all those favorable prejudices, has wrested from me expressions of execration and abhorrence, which upon now reviewing his acts, appear to me too feeble and too nerveless for the nefarious occasion! I hate tyrants in every shape; but I know of no words to express my detestation of an American tyrant. Sir, by my masters in the art of portrait painting, I have been taught that, in the delineation of characters, the writer ought to take into consideration not the acts only, but the motives, the occasion, the aggravating or extenuating circumstances, the provocation, the policy, the real or apparent necessity—in fact, all and each of the reasons by which men may be induced to act. All those circumstances, then, connected with the acts of General Jackson here, I took into consideration—his birth, his education, his pursuits, his civil and military employments, his long life under a Republican Government, his glory—yes, sir, his glory; a noble, once, now the worst, very worst, feature in his character—his glory, which concatenated him with the glory of his country by an adamant chain; well, even that adamant chain of glory he has in sunder rent.

What consideration of comparatively frigid duty can check in his mad career the man who could not be checked by the glowing enthusiasm of his own noble deeds? I say nothing here of his former crimes; they would load the canvass, without adding to the effect of the picture. Those crimes, the disgustingly rich subject of another picture, themselves are without physiognomy alongside of the sacrilegious profanation of his own fame. And for what have these invaluable sacrifices been made? That he might play the tyrant over his fellow-citizens—his fellow-citizens whose happiness had been intrusted to him by the President of the United States, whose happiness he had sworn to promote.

One word more, and I have done. The question now to be decided is not the insignificant and unimportant question of the difficulty between General Jackson and myself. It is a question of country or no country; constitution or no constitution; liberty or slavery. The despotism which attacks the liberty of one of the meanest of the inhabitants of this country, makes an attack upon the liberty of all. Every tyrant began his career by rendering eminent splendid services to his country. Cæsar had conquered the Gauls, subdued a part of Germany, and even pointed out Great Britain to the ambitious cupidity of his countrymen, before he turned his parricidal arm against Rome itself. I speak not this now with reference only to the present occasion. But, sir, tyrants beget tyrants. Beware!

N. B. It appears I was in error in stating the number of suits decided. From the reference to the docket of the court, it seems the whole number of suits filed is one hundred and twenty, of which between sixty and seventy only have been decided. Appeals, it seems, are still carried on before the acting Governor.

Mr. Fromentin to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, December 21, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor of sending you, enclosed, the opinion of Mr. Acre, the very able and upright counsel of Mr. Innerarity.

In my last communication to you, I made a mistake in stating the number of the judges who constitute the real audiencia at Fort Principe. Although I have no positive means here of ascertaining the real truth, yet, from information obtained since I wrote, I believe that I greatly exaggerated their number.

I omitted, likewise, to state that the Governor of Cuba, assisted by the auditor of war, enjoyed, under the old Government of Spain, the same judicial powers, to be exercised within the country under his immediate jurisdiction, which were enjoyed by the Governors of both East and West Florida.

This mistake of mine on one side, and omission on the other, do not, however, affect in any way my reasonings, nor the conclusions I have come to with respect to the jurisdiction of the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, so far as the jurisdiction claimed by General Jackson here is concerned.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ELIG. FROMENTIN.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

[Enclosure in XIV.]

In the Supreme Judicial Court of West Florida.

OPINION.

HEIRS OF VIDAL vs. JOHN INNERARITY.

At the request of the defendant, I have examined the report of the auditors, to whose investigation the merits of the above-entitled cause were submitted, and, having given the best consideration I am capable of, I now proceed to offer my views of the law on the points whereon the auditors have differed. The question thus made for the consideration of the court is, whether there is sufficient proof of the payment, by the house of Forbes, of the sums adjudged by the tribunal to Eslava and Le Blanc, as the dividends of the claims against the estate of Vidal. This question must be answered by the rules of evidence established by the laws of Spain, and recognised by her tribunals of justice. By that law, mercantile books, regularly kept, prove their contents, and are evidence of the claims of the merchant against his debtors to any amount, provided they appear to have been fairly kept, and contain in themselves nothing so suspicious as to counteract the prima facie evidence which the civil law, or law of Spain, declares them to be; and the courts of justice will always enter up judgment for the amount thus by them appearing to be due. In Louisiana, this rule of the civil law is modified and narrowed by statute, which requires that the merchant books should contain the parafe of the merchant on the margin of each page, made every Saturday night before a notary public, in order to make them evidence. And even by the common law, which is more strict in its rules than any other system of jurisprudence, the entries in the books of merchants can be proved by the clerk who kept them; and, if he be dead, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court, proof of his handwriting is always admitted, and is conclusive as to the correctness of the entries, and to the truth of their contents. Testing the question made by the report of the auditors by the rules of evidence, either of the civil or the common law, how does it stand? It appears by the books of the house of Forbes, which, according to the civil or Spanish law, if regularly and fairly kept, prove the truth of their contents, that there are long accounts current, and to considerable amount, with Le Blanc and Eslava, and that these two gentlemen are credited to the amount of the dividends assigned them by the tribunal of 1810: hence, the claims of the house of Forbes against them are less by the amount of those sums, put thus to their credit, and, consequently, they have received and have had the full benefit of those sums, inasmuch as they have gone to the lessening of the amount due by them to the house of Forbes. And if, at common law, they were sued by the house of Forbes for the amount of their accounts, proof of the handwriting of the clerk (if dead) who made the entries would be received, and judgment entered against them for the amount appearing to be due after deducting the credits; and if those credits would be allowed them in a suit brought on their account, it follows, as a natural consequence, that they have received the full benefit of those credits from the moment they were given; or, in other words, that the amounts with which they have been credited were paid to them the moment they were put as an offset against their debts. Therefore, in every point of view in which I have been able to consider this case, whether I test it by the rules of evidence acknowledged by the Spanish law, or by those recognised by the English law, my mind is led to the inevitable conclusion that there is sufficient and ample proof that the sums of money assigned to Eslava and Le Blanc, as the dividends of their claims against the estate of Vidal, have been paid to them, and that, therefore, they can have no claim against that estate for those dividends they have thus received; and, consequently, neither that estate, nor any one interested therein, can have any claim against the house of Forbes for these moneys. Such is certainly the law, and such, it is humbly conceived, ought to be the judgment of the court made upon this point by the auditors.

It will be remarked that all I have hitherto said is predicated on the supposition that the books containing the entries in question have been regularly kept. To ascertain this fact, (and it is an important one, as on it depends, I consider, the means of arriving at truth, and coming to a correct decision,) perhaps it might be proper to submit them to the inspection of intelligent merchants, and to receive their report as proof of the fact.

On the subject of the $200 paid to E. Livingston, of New Orleans, for professional services, my mind, on the first impression, was induced to concur with the report of the auditors, and to believe that it ought not to be allowed to the house of Forbes in the settlement of their accounts with the estate of Vidal, inasmuch as every client is responsible to his counsel for his conventional fees; but, on reflection and mature consideration of the matter, I am pretty well satisfied that, in this particular, I was mistaken, and am now inclined to think that this sum too must, according to law, be allowed. I am brought to this conclusion from the following facts and reasons arising thereon:

The suit instituted by Mr. Forbes was brought by attachment against the goods of Vidal, in New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, where the civil law has been adopted; whereby the defendant, when judgment goes against him, is considered in delicto, i. e. in fault, and, therefore, is decreed to pay all the costs and charges which by that fault have been incurred in compelling him to do right; and the practice of the courts of Louisiana has uniformly been, I believe, in all suits against absentees, to appoint counsel to defend them, and, out of the proceeds of the property attached, to decree a sufficient sum for the payment of all the expenses incurred in the suit on both sides.

By the record in this case it appears that the sum paid to Mr. Livingston was paid to him by the sheriff, under an order by the court, out of the funds produced by the sale of the goods attached; and this order was, no doubt, entered in conformity to the practice of the court on similar occasions. If such is the law, and such the practice of the courts of Louisiana, it is evident that the payment of these $200 was an act of the court, over which Mr. Forbes had no control, and, therefore, he ought not now to be called on to pay, from his own funds, a sum of money which a court, having jurisdiction of the matter, had ordered to be paid by another party. The record of that cause imports absolute verity as to the facts contained in it, and the judgment of the court rendered on those facts cannot be inquired into by the tribunals of another jurisdiction. That judgment is, that the estate of Vidal should pay the charges, viz: $200, incurred in compelling it to pay its debts; and how can a court now, of a different jurisdiction, possessing no powers of review, reverse the judgment of that tribunal, and make a different order as to the subject-matter it had under consideration?

No judgment whatever can be legally given in this case in favor of the devisees of Vidal, (for they are not heirs, as erroneously called in their petition and proceedings in this case,) because, from the distribution of the assets of his estate, in 1810, as well as from the report of the auditors recently made, it is evident that the estate is insolvent, and, therefore, that nothing is left for the devisees, who can never take any thing in prejudice to the creditors; it being a maxim of law, as well as a very commonplace one of morals, that "a man must be just before he is generous;" in other words, he must pay his debts before he gives legacies; and if judgment cannot be given in favor of the devisees or petitioners, it is conceived that the cause cannot be taken up for the benefit of the creditors, because they have not asked it, and are fully satisfied, as is manifest from their putting in no claim. And it would be a strange anomaly, and a most singular phenomenon in jurisprudence, to see a court voluntarily and gratuitously pursuing the fancied interests and enforcing the imaginary claims of persons who have not said they have any, and who have certainly never asked its interference.

Having considered the report of the auditors, I proceed to offer some remarks on that part of the judgment of the court which decrees interest on the sum of $683 06, from the 20th of November, 1810, on the supposition that, at that time, a final settlement of the estate of Vidal took place, and the house of Forbes was ordered to pay over the deposit in their hands, which the court supposes to be the sum above mentioned.

In decreeing interest, under the circumstances of the case, I am clearly of opinion that the court acted unadvisedly, and that a review of the facts, as they appear on record, would lead to a very different judgment.

The following statement of facts, verified by the record, will place the question of interest in a clear light:

In the year 1806, Don Nicolas M. Vidal, then late auditor of war of West Florida, leaving considerable of real and personal estate and many debts behind him, died in Pensacola.

By his will, he devised his property, after the payment of his debts, to two mulatto children, who are the present petitioners, styling themselves heirs.

His executor, Christoval de Armas, of New Orleans, sold his personal property, and, after the payment of mortgages on his real estate, there remained $2,645 25; which sum he having failed to give security for, as by law was required of executors residing out of the jurisdiction of the province, it was ordered by the tribunal, exercising the powers of a court of probates, to be deposited with the house of Forbes for safekeeping, for the benefit of the creditors, and until they should verify their claims against the estate.

A meeting of the creditors having been had, and the affairs of the estate deliberated on by them, the tribunal, in 1810, after having assigned to each one his dividend, ordered Mr. John Innerarity, the attorney of the house of Forbes, to pay, within two months, to the creditors, the sums that had, by the judicial contador, been assigned to them as their dividends, viz:

To Euphrosyne Hisnard	-	-	$1,379 00
To Terence Le Blanc	-	-	209 31½
To the officers of the court, (collectively)	-	-	512 06½
To Miguel Eslava	-	-	432 00
			$2,532 37½

These sums, paid to the creditors according to the order of the court, deducted from the sum of $2,645 25 deposited, leave a balance in the hands of the house of Forbes of $112 87½; to which add the sum of $183 37½, received from New Orleans belonging to the estate, and the sum of $296 25 will remain of the deposit, against which the house of Forbes have a claim (which was allowed by the tribunal, in the distribution to the creditors, and which was a balance due on a note of hand given by Vidal to that house for borrowed money) amounting to $453 25; leaving a balance due by the estate to the house of Forbes of $157. Hence, there is neither principal nor interest belonging to the estate of Vidal in the hands of John Innerarity, the attorney of Forbes. And even if it were admitted that the sum of $645 25 was really in the hands of the defendant, as supposed by the court, it is evident that interest cannot be exacted on it, inasmuch as it is admitted to have been a deposit of the simple kind, which, being for the benefit of the depositor, and as a favor to him, does not draw interest until after a demand and refusal; and this sum belonging to creditors, who, if they have not received it, certainly have not demanded it, the court cannot, at the instance of third persons, having themselves no claim, decree interest to persons really entitled, who have not asked it.

It may be said that, if any injury has been done to the defendant, he is without remedy, and must submit to his fate, inasmuch as judgment has been entered, and the court cannot recall it. I answer that, though there is no court in this province having appellate powers, yet, as this is a tribunal acting under the forms of the civil law, and governed by the rules of practice, it is competent to the same court to review its own decisions.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

The same power which did the injury can repair the wrong. Dissolvitur eodem ligamine quo ligatur.

At common law, the court has control over its judgments during the term they are entered, and, if satisfied that complete justice has not been done in any cause tried during the session, the practice is to grant a new trial, and, on application to the discretion of the court, under such circumstances, has never been known to fail. And even if, after the end of the term, it is discovered that more complete justice would be attained by a new trial, though the court of common law cannot grant it, the same judge, exercising chancery powers, will, in his character of chancellor, award an injunction, and, on proof of the allegations of the bill, (reasons for a new trial,) will grant relief.

A court sitting under the authority of the civil law has no terms; it is always open; hence, it has the same control over its judgments, at all times before the final execution, that a court of common law has during its terms. It also combines in its very constitution chancery and common law powers; so that a court thus constituted is competent to do whatever both courts, in the fullest exercise of their jurisdiction, could do. I therefore infer, from this view of the powers of the court, governed, as this is, by the rules of the civil or Spanish law, that there will be no hesitation in granting a rehearing. The petitioners cannot complain, because, if they are entitled to any thing, their right will not be diminished by justice being done; and, if they are entitled to nothing, they cannot, in common honesty, expect any thing. But, above all, when justice is the question, no technical questions, nor reasoning founded in fiction, should be suffered to impede her course; no considerations of delicacy to predecessors should restrain the hand that dispenses right. Fiat justitia ruat cælum.

Adjutant General Robert Butler to Jose Coppinger, Governor of St. Augustine.

ST. AUGUSTINE, May 26, 1821.

SIR: I had the honor to inform you on the 24th instant of my arrival at this place, and of the powers with which I have been vested by the Government of the United States. It affords me much satisfaction to find, from the short conversation I had on yesterday with your Excellency, that our sentiments so well accord, and that our exertions will be mutual in affording every possible facility to a speedy and satisfactory termination of the official intercourse anticipated between us. In strict accordance with my instructions, it becomes necessary to ask officially of your Excellency whether you have been furnished with any orders from the Governor General of Cuba authorizing the delivery of the province under your command to the commissioner appointed for its reception on the part of my Government. I beg leave to add, in conclusion, that I am prepared to commence the negotiation, and to comply with the stipulations of the treaty touching this subject in its full extent.

I have the honor, &c.

ROBERT BUTLER,

Adjutant General and Commissioner.

In answer to the note of this date which you have been pleased to send me, I have to state that I am sincerely desirous that the business for which you have been appointed by your Government should be arranged in the most uniform and satisfactory manner to our Governments and to ourselves. I ratify, as I mentioned in our visit of yesterday, my being without the orders of my Government necessary to our treating on the delivery of this province, under my care, according to the treaty concluded by the United States and Spain; but which, while it impedes the opening a communication on the subject, can nowise embarrass or straiten our individual relations. I will take the earliest opportunity of informing his Excellency the Captain General of Cuba and the Floridas, on whom I immediately depend, of your arrival and mission, in order to the most speedy attention to your charge assuring you, in the mean time, of the best wishes and attention within my power. God preserve you many years.

SIR: I received yesterday despatches from his Excellency the Captain General of the island of Cuba and the two Floridas, with competent orders to proceed to the delivery of this province to the commissioner authorized by the Government of the United States to receive it; and, as you have been pleased to inform me that you have come vested with that commission, I now give you notice of it, in order that the intended end may be accomplished. Your obedient servant,

No. 4.

Colonel Butler to the Governor of St. Augustine.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 8, 1821.

SIR: I had the satisfaction to receive your note of this morning, in which you are pleased to inform me that you have received "competent orders" to arrange the delivery of this province to the commissioner authorized by the Government of the United States to receive it. As we now are the mutually declared authorities touching this business, and as, I presume, you are, as I am, satisfied in this official recognition, I shall at once conform to my instructions, by opening the subject generally, that no unnecessary delay may arise.

To enable me to comply with the provisions of the seventh article of the treaty lately ratified by our respective Governments, it becomes necessary to call on your Excellency for a statement of the number of officers, both civil and military, and troops, for which I am to provide transportation to the Havana, and also to arrange the provisions for their subsistence; which, although not expressly mentioned in the treaty, yet the liberal construction which my Government is disposed to give to that instrument has induced the arrangement. It is desirable, also, to have a distinction drawn between those officers who have families and those who have not, as I feel disposed to afford as much comfort as possible, without departing from my instructions, in the arrangement of the transports. As this information is important to the immediate consummation of my preparatory duties, I hope you will give me early advice, to enable me to place myself subject to your wishes in the final arrangement.

To evince my respect for you personally, as well as officially, and feeling, as I do, every friendly disposition towards cultivating the happy understanding which exists between our respective Governments, I am induced to ask your Excellency to embrace, in the form of a projet, 1st. Your wishes with regard to the manner and probable time of delivery of the province under your command; 2d. The subject islands dependent on said province; 3d. Public lots and squares; 4th. Public edifices; 5th. Fortifications, with their appendant defences; 6th. Barracks and other buildings, which are not private property; and, 7th. The archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said province, accompanied with a schedule of the property contained under the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th heads. The arrangements which may relate to the embarkation of our troops I shall leave out of view for the present, as I desire on this head to consult your wishes, in a conference, previous to entering of record and preliminaries touching that point: believing as I do that we can more satisfactorily meet each other's views by a conference than by written communications. As the projet which I have requested is, when complete, to be in the character of a general arrangement, destined to be passed for the information of our respective Governments, as an acquittal of the duties required of us, I feel the more solicitous that you should submit it, as the most particular evidence of the friendly disposition of the Government which I have the honor to represent.

I renew to your Excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

ROBERT BUTLER.

SIR: Before satisfying each of the particulars contained in the note which, under date of yesterday, you did me the honor of sending me, I have thought it convenient to inform you, that, in the expedient that must be formed, to proceed to the delivery of the province under my charge, there must be inserted authentic copies of the treaty concluded between our respective Governments; of the royal schedule of the 24th of October last, that I have received for the delivery, and the rest of the orders appertaining to it; and likewise including that in which I am named and empowered by his Excellency the Captain General of the island of Cuba and the two Floridas, in his name to make said delivery to the commissioner of the United States of America duly authorized to receive it; and although, individually, I am perfectly satisfied that you are the commissioner, notwithstanding, to proceed with all the circumspection requisite to so important a subject, I must, therefore, beg you to oblige me by sending the document in which you are authorized for said commission, a copy of which will be united to said documents, serving as preliminaries on the delivery and receipt, that will be done with all the solemnity possible. In the mean time, I shall communicate to you a knowledge of the other affairs which you demand, and always with the highest consideration and esteem for your person.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 10, 1821.

SIR: I have received your note of yesterday, in which you assign the reasons for not "satisfying each of the particulars" contained in my note of the 8th instant; and although it is believed, on my part, that a more summary mode would meet the views of my Government than what you deem necessary, growing out of your instructions, I readily acquiesce in the proposed arrangement, and have, therefore, herewith enclosed, for your satisfaction, my appointment as commissioner to arrange with your Excellency the duties intrusted to our charge. In the mean time, I hope you will favor me with the information desired in the first part of my note of the 8th instant, relating to the arrangement of transports, at as early a period as may be convenient and proper.

With sentiments of great respect and esteem, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 11, 1821.

SIR: I have received your note of the 10th instant, in which you enclose me your appointment as commissioner to receive, in the name of the United States of America, the province under my charge; and, although you have pointed out to me that it was believed, on your part, that a more summary mode than that I have proposed was the persuasion in which your Government was would be observed, I must remark, that, attending to what the treaty, royal schedule of delivery, orders of my Captain General, and the importance of the same affairs merit, I have thought the proposal the most analogical, and worthy to fill the objects, although I am disposed to rectify it in any of the parts that do not agree, or are unnecessary in the insinuated requisites. Coinciding with the ideas that you have manifested to me, it is my desire that our respective commissions be complied with as soon as possible; but, having received, at the same time with the orders for the delivery of this province, those that ought to have been communicated ere this, to prepare and facilitate said delivery, is therefore the cause that it cannot be executed in all its parts with that despatch we desire. On that account, I request your attention in respect to the advices and intelligence my Government has given me relative to the treaty, to make known to all the inhabitants of the country, as well that part stipulated in respect to them, as also the particular steps they have determined shall be taken for those who wish to emigrate to various parts of the Spanish dominions. The artillery, military stores, and ammunition, that are to be transported, is another of the important points, the operation of which demands some order and time in this particular, as well as others, which, although they are not of as much consequence, it is requisite to execute them. I therefore consider it necessary we should hold a private conference, a medium by which we can conciliate our respective opinions, and accelerate its brevity; for which occasion I reserve manifesting you my observations, that, united with those you may uniformly make, they can be formalized in a species of convention, that will point out, with exactitude, the method of the operation, and will deliver us from some difficulties that generally occur in such cases. In answer to the first particular of your note of the 8th instant, I enclose you a circumstantial account of the military force of this garrison, including the families belonging thereto; likewise another, of those employed in this place under the immediate dependency of the national finance, both one and the other, with their respective remarks, for the ends that may be thought necessary.

Before leaving this subject, rendering your Government the honor and justice it merits, I pay them the tribute of my sincere thanks for the liberal sense given to the seventh article of the treaty; generosity supplying the necessary provisions during the voyage of the officers, troops, and those persons employed in the finance; and to you, sir, for the frankness you have manifested, and which will, no doubt, shorten our future communications. As I have heretofore expressed, I think it proper there should be a personal interview, for arranging the embarkation of said artillery, military stores, and ammunition, and other particulars which I wish to communicate. We will then determine positively the day on which the delivery of the province under my charge can be effected, as all other calculations would be useless without such an antecedent agreement. In respect to the lots, squares, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other public property, with the documents and archives that appertain directly to the right and sovereignty of this province, you can immediately designate the person or persons that are to receive the inventories, plans, &c., to prepare and devise the needful, for the purpose of advancing this operation, to the commandant of engineers of this city, for the delivery of each of the respective departments, and also the documents appertaining to individual property, and those alluding to the sovereignty of the province; for which I will give the competent order, when I am advised by you of those chosen for the purpose. To give you, as I wish, an exact account of the adjacent islands to this province, is almost beyond my power, for the want of a general map that delineates their positions, extension, and circumstances; but, with the exception of Amelia, which is in the possession of the United States, and that forming the harbor of this port, known by the name of St. Anastacia, on which is situated the look-out house, all the rest are nearly without population, as likewise the public lands. You will therefore have a knowledge of those to be taken possession of as Government property, under the impression there may be of their not being granted. I believe want of exactitude will suffer no difficulties to arise, seeing the good faith and long possession which the Spanish Government has had of them since the treaty concluded between her and Great Britain, at Versailles, the 19th September, 1783, in which no particular specification is made of said islands, nor is there any document relative to the affair. The plain and ingenuous manifestation with which I have tried to satisfy the particulars contained in your note of the 8th, must convince you of the friendly disposition to fulfil the commission confided to me with that harmony and friendship which has until now guided us, and which, I am certain, will not be interrupted, as I have the greatest opinion of the amiable qualities which adorn you. God preserve you many years.

REMARKS.—No transport is required for the individuals belonging to the schooner Barbarita, the gun-boats Zeloza and Ymutable, as well as those of the launch and custom-house boat, as they are to perform the voyage in the first of these vessels. Moreover, that in the total of the persons employed contained in this return, there are some who, from sickness, cannot proceed with the expedition.

No. 9.

Colonel Butler to Governor Coppinger.

ST. AUGUSTINE, E. F., June 13, 1821.

SIR: Your note of the 11th instant, with the accompanying documents, I had the pleasure to receive last evening. The sentiments expressed therein have been duly examined and properly appreciated. The information contained in the schedules you have furnished will enable me to arrange the transports, I hope, satisfactorily. Permit me to hope that you will give such instructions to the commandant of engineers as will authorize him to prepare an inventory of the lots, squares, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other public property comprehended in the cession, together with a plan of the respective towns or places, in which it is peculiarly desirable to have the public property designated by some color different from that owned by individuals, and to have attached their extent of limits. On the arrival of the officer whose functions embrace this duty, I shall immediately give him the necessary orders for their reception, of which I shall duly apprise you. I shall take occasion to designate, shortly, a suitable person to receive the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of this province, as authorized by you. It now becomes necessary to notice particularly that part of your Excellency's note which relates to ordnance, military stores, &c.; and I regret that part of my note of the 8th seems to have been misunderstood wherein I made the expression "fortifications, with their appendant defences;" which was intended to convey distinctly to you that my Government considered the artillery in the fortifications appendant, and of right belonging to them, and embraced in the meaning and intention of the cession, and, therefore, to be left with them. I had fondly hoped that the same construction would have been given by our respective Governments to the treaty; but, from the tenor of your letter in relation to the artillery, it would appear that your instructions have rendered their removal necessary. Should this be the case, it becomes my duty to adhere strictly to the same system of construction in every part of the treaty embraced by my instructions; and I therefore solicit the information, that I may adopt such measures as the subject requires. So soon as the foregoing point is disposed of, I shall immediately call on you to meet each other's views in conference, touching all the matters that will remain for discussion; and I must be permitted to assure you that my hopes and expectations of a happy and speedy termination of our respective duties are not in the least diminished; and I renew to you the assurance of my most respectful consideration and great regard.

No. 10.

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 14, 1821.

I have given the necessary orders to the commandant of engineers to prepare the inventories of the lots, squares, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and the rest of the property appertaining to the nation, manifested to you in my note of the 11th instant, that you would of course, on your part, name the person to receive them; said commandant of engineers will deliver suitable plans, and in that of the town will be found delineated the lots and other public property, with the marks and explanations separately, (that detail which you desire;) as also will be ready for delivery the documents that have direct relation to the property and sovereignty of this province; for the particulars of which I refer you to my said note. After weighing the expression of your note of the 10th instant, which treats of the "fortifications with their dependencies, or appertaining defences," understood by me in the literal sense, was, that dependencies signified the exterior works of the fortification—magazines and other similar works, such as the lines and palisades that unite the fortress of this city and surround it. For this reason I found no difficulty, and I took a cursory view of the expression; but having given rise to the manifestation that you have been pleased to make me, that your Government considered the artillery, ammunition, and ordnance stores that are in the fortifications appertaining to them by right, and that such effects are comprehended in the meaning of the cession, I must inform you that a contrary explanation has been given by my Government on this point; and you will therefore permit me to make some observations that will convince you, I am persuaded, of the rectitude of this judgment. By fortification, I understand the work that is raised to defend and enclose a certain space, the work consisting, in particular, of the edifice, but not in the arms, ammunition, and ordnance stores, in which each nation varies in its structures, tactics, and military laws. If it is an axiom that the fortifications want arms and ammunition for their defence, it is equally so that they want force for their management, as likewise the necessities for their subsistence; by which, if the support of the question consists that the fortifications to be defended require the first, by this identical reason the second may be demanded, as there is as much propriety in the one as the other; whenever, without the reunion of these things, it will not be said that is a fortified point, and in a state of defence. Under a different aspect will the moveable and other furniture, then in use in the barracks and public buildings, be delivered with them. It is not reasonable that it should be so, as the lots, furniture of the troops, and other utensils that serve for the convenience and necessity of those that inhabit them, cannot be included in the delivery. It is observed between nations, that by the sale, cession, exchange, and conveyance of this class of property, is understood merely the buildings, unless it is stipulated decisively that in the sale, cession, &c., the furniture, with the rest of the moveable effects, is a part of the property; and it is very clear to infer that in the treaty, where it distinctly mentions the delivery of the fortifications, it is solely the material and immoveable parts, but not the goods and effects necessary for its defence. It is under this belief that the Spanish Government directs me to agree with the commissioners of the United States, in the mode of removing the troops, ammunition, baggage, &c.; from which I infer that the whole is to be executed at their charge. In conclusion, it is well known that, on the delivery of this province by Great Britain to Spain, the former withdrew all the above-mentioned effects, as being the practice in similar cases, unless stipulated for otherwise. I remain in the persuasion that what I have expressed will be sufficient, in order that the meaning and interpretation may be rectified, which you pointed out to me as the instruction given by your Government to the expression in the treaty relative to the fortifications; and weighing, as I am assured you will, the essential part of this note, we may proceed to the points still depending, and conclude with mutual satisfaction our respective duties. God preserve you many years.

No. 11.

Colonel Butler, to Governor Coppinger.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 15, 1821.

SIR: Your note, under date of yesterday, in answer to mine of the 13th instant, has been handed to me this morning. I feel great satisfaction at your having given such general attention to the subjects contained in my note aforesaid. There are two points in your note which claim, on my part, explanation. The first relates to the following sentence, as given by you, in quotation from my note of the 10th, viz: "fortifications with their dependencies, or appertaining defences." As this is calculated to give impressions different from what was expressed, I beg to be excused for giving the annexed quotation from the copy in my possession bearing date the 8th, and not the 10th instant, and which is in the following words, viz: "fortifications, with their appendant defences." The second point relates to the expression in your Excellency's note just received, and of which the following is a quotation: "That your Government considered the artillery, ammunition, and ordnance stores that are in the fortifications, appertaining to them by right, and that such effects are comprehended in the meaning of the cession." Opposed to which, I insert the following quotation from my note of the 13th instant, and to which you allude, viz: "That my Government considered the artillery in the fortifications appendant, and of right belonging to them, and embraced in the meaning and intention of the cession, and, therefore, to be left with them." From this expression, your Excellency will certainly perceive that the United States laid no claim to the ammunition and ordnance stores. Could I think myself at liberty to enter into discussion on the merits of the construction which my Government has given to the treaty, in relation to the artillery. I flatter myself that I could convince you, satisfactorily, that the meaning and intention of the contracting parties were, that the artillery in the fortifications was appendant to, and should remain with them. Such would also appear to have been the impression of the Captain General of Cuba, from his order to you of the 5th ultimo, (a copy of which I have received from the United States Commissioner, from Cuba,) in which he does not require the removal of the artillery; added to which, the total silence of the seventh article of the treaty on the subject of furnishing transportation for the artillery, ammunition, and ordnance stores, or even provisions for the subsistence of the troops on their passage. As I feel myself authorized to infer, from your note of the 14th instant, that you are determined to remove the artillery, it becomes my duty to enter my protest against the measure. But, before appending it to this communication, I would suggest that, should you feel authorized to form a different conclusion with regard to the artillery, and to determine to leave it, I will engage to furnish a reasonable proportion of transportation for the ammunition and ordnance stores; but, on the other hand, should you still determine to remove the artillery, I do hereby respectfully protest against the measure, and declare that I do not consider the United States bound to furnish either transportation or escort for the artillery, ammunition, and ordnance stores; and that they have, and will exercise, a claim on the Spanish Government, as well for the artillery so removed, as the provisions which they have procured for the subsistence of the Spanish troops from this to the Havana, should the same be made use of. As this point now remains for decision exclusively with you, and should that decision correspond with the sentiments contained in your last note, I consider it placed out of the pale of my duties, and subject to future discussion between our two respective Governments alone. I have to request that the public property at Amelia Island will also be embraced in the plans preparing by the commandant of engineers. I shall do myself the honor to call and confer with your Excellency on to-morrow with respect to our further duties, and conclude with renewed assurances of personal esteem and great regard.

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 16, 1821.

SIR: I had the honor of replying in my last note to yours of the 8th and 13th, (which last, through mistake, was referred to instead of that of the 10th,) on the same subjects of which you required an explanation in your note of yesterday. In my opinion, the expressions in your first two notes are synonymous, viz: "fortifications with their appertaining defences," or their "appendant defences;" and if by these you wish to give them different constructions, as you indicate to me in your last, it is clear that, on my part, the competent explanation given you fully in the note of the 14th was what I understood by such words; and having manifested to me the sense with which you wrote them, I consider that dwelling any longer on the subject would waste insensibly the time which ought to be dedicated to objects of more interest. You are aware that I am merely the executor of the orders that my Government communicates to me, which I must strictly follow. In my former, I mentioned fully that my opinion was, that, in the word fortifications in the treaty, the artillery and other moveables were not comprehended; and you maintained that, from the signification of that word, and the intention of the two contracting Powers, the artillery in the fortifications was appendant, and of course belonged to your Government, which you endeavored to prove from the copy transmitted to you of an official letter from his Excellency the Captain General to me, bearing date the 5th of May, in which he does not make any particular mention of the transportation of the artillery; and although it is so, I am sorry they have not likewise transmitted you copies of the remainder of his Excellency's official correspondence. But should it not be so, I will not deprive you of a knowledge of the royal schedule of the 24th of October last, in which His Majesty positively orders that all the papers and effects that belong to the nation, and are not found comprehended or mentioned in the clause of the cession, shall be transported to other parts of the Spanish dominions; in which case I have considered the artillery. Notwithstanding, wishing to give you a proof of respect, and avoid protests and reclamations, I propose, and confirm myself, that the cannon mounted at present on the batteries of Fort St. Mark's and Matanzas, (the only permanent fortifications that exist in the province,) remain as they actually are, until our respective Governments make the explanation and agreement they may think proper; but you will provide the transports for the residue of the artillery, a larger number not being necessary for their defence in the change of Governments, as with it ceases all apprehension of any disturbance by land, and the lines being unnecessary on which some were mounted. I also offer to leave with you a moderate quantity of ammunition and ordnance stores for the use of said pieces, making of the whole an inventory, that the Spanish Government may be answered and satisfied should they determine its delivery; to which proposition I flatter myself you will consent. The commandant of engineers will deliver you the plan of Amelia, with the information that may exist relative to it. I am assured that, in the conference you mentioned, all the pending points will be more satisfactorily adjusted than is possible in our written communications, which are delayed in consequence of the necessity of their translation, and where it is to be apprehended that our respective expressions may not be conveyed exactly. I will have much satisfaction in repeating to you personally my respects, and I assure you, in the mean time, of my high consideration and esteem.

God preserve you many years.

R. BUTLER, Esq. Commissioner, &c.

No: 13.

Colonel Butler to Governor Coppinger.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 18, 1821.

SIR: I received your note of the 16th instant, on that day, in answer to mine of the 15th. The promised translation was handed this morning. After duly examining the documents you were pleased to have me furnished with, in relation to the stores, artillery, &c., and after a careful examination of my instructions touching those points, I find that I cannot meet your proposition. While I sincerely regret the difficulties which we are, from our respective instructions, placed in, I feel extremely desirous to place the subject happily at rest between us, and therefore respectfully propose the following arrangement, in addition to that given in my note of the 15th; which is, that you will consent to leave all the artillery, with their implements and a proportion of ammunition, &c., for which I will give a corresponding receipt, placing the proper construction of the treaty in the hands of our respective Governments; and to facilitate, as much as possible, the contemplated exchange, I will engage to furnish transportation for the ammunition and stores, save that of the cannon balls, bombs, and grape shot, which you can have transported; and, in like manner, the transportation furnished on my part, as well as the provisions consumed on the voyage, and the ammunition which may be left with me, shall be subject to a similar adjustment, on the part of our respective Governments. Should your instructions, in conjunction with your sound judgment, authorize you to adopt this proposition, I shall be more than pleased, as I am constrained, from a sense of duty, to say that it is the only arrangement on this subject which I feel at liberty to enter into; but should your views not correspond with mine, whilst I regret the circumstance, I must refer you to the sentiments of my former note, in which is embodied my protest, for your final decision thereon. It is now proper that I should inform your Excellency that the United States are prepared with escort, transport, provisions, and water, to accommodate the Spanish officers and troops to the Havana; and that I am prepared to enter immediately into the general arrangement for the reception of the province which you have been selected by your Government to deliver. I have designated Major Cross as a fit and proper person to receive the archives which relate to the sovereignty and individual property of the province; and Lieutenant Baird, of the corps of artillery, to receive the inventories, plans, &c., and to take possession of the islands dependant, public lots and squares, public edifices, and other buildings which are not private property; and have therefore to request that you will give the necessary orders in good time, as you were pleased to signify in your note of the 11th instant. I must advert for a moment to the expression in your last note which implies a waste of time in the explanations which I gave in my note of the 15th; with these sentiments I beg leave to differ, as I deem it an essential duty to correct misunderstandings or incorrect quotations on important subjects. I need not urge upon your Excellency how desirable it is that the contemplated exchange should be speedily effected, as well on account of the situation of the troops lying off this city, as of the accumulating expense daily arising from our state of preparation under the treaty. Permit me to hope, however, that I may be furnished with your final decision on the subject of the artillery at as early an hour as possible.

ROBERT BUTLER.

No. 14.

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA,
June 19, 1821.

I have examined the contents of your Excellency's letter of yesterday, and, in answer, I wish to inform you that, in order to facilitate the delivery, and give your Excellency an unequivocal proof that it is my primary object, (as we cannot, consistently with our respective orders and instructions, agree on the term fortification, mentioned in the treaty,) we ought to adopt, on our part, a prudent and friendly position, at least until our Governments resolve on this point. If I comprehend your Excellency's propositions, they are, that if I do not consent to leave all the artillery subject to the decision of our Governments, your Excellency offers to transport, on your account, the ammunition and stores, excepting the articles of cannon, bombs, balls, and grape shot, which will remain at mine; leaving subject, likewise, the transportation which your Excellency offers, and the rations consumed on the voyage of said ammunition and stores, to superior determination; and the ammunition and implements of war that I leave to remain subject to the same determination. I agree that it should be so; and I suppose that your Excellency calculates on there remaining in the forts St. Mark's and Matanzas (the only existing points of permanent fortification) the artillery that for their defence are actually in battery, as your Excellency proposes in your note of the 16th, and of the number and calibre of which a separate statement has been given. In this conception which I have formed of your Excellency's proposition, I repeat my acquiescence; and as it is my wish that the aforementioned artillery, balls, &c., not comprehended among the articles that are to be left, should be carried and conveyed at the same time with the troops, I hope that your Excellency will ratify the same, in the assurance that I will adopt the most prompt measures in order to the attainment of this effect. I am informed that all is prepared on the part of your Excellency for the evacuation of the territory by the garrison under my charge, and that your Excellency is in readiness to enter into the general arrangement for the receipt of the province; therefore, and that we may commence carrying the same into effect, your Excellency can ordain Major Cross to apply to me for the delivery of the documents of the secretary's office of this Government, appertaining to the national property. As respects the delivery of the public archives, containing the records of individual property of this province, that will be delayed until various doubts that occur are cleared up; but they will not be removed until then, nor will I leave this place until all matters are regulated and concluded between us that demand my personal assistance. Lieutenant Baird, of the artillery, can likewise apply to me, that he may, with my intervention, commence receiving the inventories, plans, &c., from the engineer's department. Your Excellency makes an observation that I cannot pass in silence. When an expression is understood, and there has been made thereon the explanation it requires, I consider the term of answering closed; and as my official letters of the 14th and 16th satisfy what your Excellency presented in yours of the 15th, I consider that I was warranted, without infringing on delicacy, to say that detaining ourselves would sensibly delay time, and postpone matters of more importance. But if it offers any doubts, I am disposed to clear them up; and should there be none, your Excellency will do me the justice to participate in my good wishes. From the moment I received the orders of my Government to act in this commission, I have been busy, and am incessantly busy, in its promotion. Your Excellency knows that we are greatly in advance of the time allowed by the treaty for the evacuation; and although the situation of your troops stimulates my exertions, I could have wished the delay of their approach a few days longer, at least until our accordance could have fixed on a probable period in which their coming on would have been more opportune; but, as it has not been so, I am disposed to give up the possession of the territory, by the evacuation of my troops, as early as possible, and which will be governed by the final resolution of your Excellency on the artillery, if that is agreeable to what I have expressed in the beginning of this letter; and, in the meantime, I renew my particular respects and high consideration of your Excellency.

God preserve you many years.

Colonel Butler to Governor Coppinger.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 20, 1821.

SIR: I have received and examined the contents of your note bearing date yesterday, in answer to mine of the 18th. I find that your Excellency has not comprehended my proposition as I could have wished. I proposed that you should leave all the artillery, and that I would furnish transport for the ammunition, stores, &c., except balls, bombs, and grape shot, which you could have transported. That part which relates to leaving, subject to the decision of our respective Governments, the cannon, implements thereto belonging, ammunition to be left with them, provisions for the voyage, and the transport to be furnished by me for the ammunition and stores, as expressed in my letter, seems to have been perfectly comprehended; and I now, with a view of putting to rest this embarrassing subject between us, ratify the construction given by you to the said proposition, in its full extent, which is comprehended as follows: The artillery (with the implements complete, and a reasonable proportion of fixed ammunition) as mounted on St. Mark's and Matanzas, and comprised in the statement handed by your aid-de-camp, as follows:

		Iron artillery.
		24 prs.	16 prs.	8 prs.
St. Marks	- - - -	10	11	0
Matanzas	- - - -	0	0	2
		Brass mortars.		Brass howitzers.
		11 inch.	7 inch.	7 inch.

Making, in all, twenty-seven pieces to remain in battery. The provisions and transports for the stores, together with the ammunition to be left, are all to be subject to the amicable arrangement of our respective Governments; and I also ratify your expectation that the artillery, balls, &c., not comprehended to be left, and for which you furnish transportation, shall be considered under convoy, provided your Excellency shall cause to be rendered to me an article signed by, and binding on, the captains of the vessels who will expect convoy, by which article the names of their vessels shall be given, and their agreement placing themselves under the orders of James Ramage, Esq., commanding the United States convoy, until their arrival and delivery at Havana. I shall give proper attention to the other subjects contained in your Excellency's note aforesaid in good time, and do myself the pleasure to see you shortly, and confer with you about the archives of this province which relate to individual property. I beg leave to express to you, in conclusion, that my Government considers the transports employed on its part, for the fulfilment of the stipulations of the treaty, as being free from port charges or other duties, both at this place and Havana; for which I hope you will give me an assurance. I highly appreciate your intentions of delivering this province at as early a period as possible, and have only to regret the multiplicity of business which presses on you.

I renew to you the assurance of my great regard and high consideration.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 21, 1821.

It affords me much satisfaction to find that a final and friendly conventional termination is placed on the business of the artillery, ammunition, and other implements of war, until our Governments determine the question definitively. To-morrow will be commenced, on my part, the embarkation of the cannon, bombs, balls, and grape shot; and I hope your Excellency will be pleased to inform me if you have in readiness the vessels that, on your part, are to transport the ammunition and implements that do not remain for the service of the twenty-seven pieces of artillery mounted on the forts, which were particularly mentioned in the statement handed by my adjutant, and expressed in your Excellency's note of yesterday, that I may make the necessary dispositions for the most early and active steps in their delivery. I return thanks to your Excellency for having acceded to my wishes in permitting the vessels freighted by me for the transportation of the cannon, bombs, &c., to be embodied in the expedition, and conveyed by the United States armed vessel commanded by James Ramage, Esq.; and for that purpose I will furnish your Excellency, in due time, with the necessary notice, in order to have the same effected, according to the desire of your Excellency has expressed.

I have the pleasure of assuring your Excellency that the vessels employed by the United States in the evacuation of this province will pay no duties whatever on their entrance into or departure from this port, and that they shall be furnished with pilots whenever wanted. But I cannot give you the same assurance with respect to the port of Havana, as I know not what may be the determination of that superior Government; but I am under the impression it will act with equal liberality. The visits of your Excellency are very pleasing to me, and will be more so, as I contemplate, in personal conferences, better and more speedy adjustments of the remaining subjects, necessary to a happy conclusion of our commissions. Before closing this, permit me to request of your Excellency information on the kind and quantity of provisions composing the rations that are to be supplied to the Spanish military and civil officers, and the troops, on the voyage, for the purpose of knowing what other articles they may provide themselves with for their accommodation.

I reiterate to your Excellency my sincere regard and particular esteem. God preserve you many years.

SIR: I have selected you as a proper person to receive and receipt for the archives which relate to the sovereignty of this province, as comprised in the second article of the late treaty between the United States and Spain. Those relating to the property of individuals will not be demanded, as they are still a matter of discussion between the commissioners. You will therefore wait on his Excellency Don Jose Coppinger, Governor and Spanish commissioner, who will authorize an officer on his part to deliver them. ST. AUGUSTINE, June 22, 1821.

SIR: Before answering the particulars of your note of yesterday, I beg leave to inform you that I have given to Major Cross and Lieutenant Baird the necessary orders, as contemplated in your letter of the 19th, and they will wait on your Excellency accordingly. In answering that part of your note aforesaid which relates to the archives or records of individual property, I take for granted that we understood each other in that, respectively, in our conference yesterday, and will remark, accordingly, that, as there appears some doubt on your part, you are desirous to await the decision of the Captain General of Cuba on the subject; at the same time, you are disposed to give me an official assurance that they shall not be removed from the province until such decision is received. Your motives cannot be otherwise than approved on my part; and as the Adeline schooner will return to this port from the Havana, a favorable opportunity offers for the conveyance of the Captain

General's answer. You will permit me to hope that you will embody my sentiments as expressed to you on that subject, in your letter to the Captain General, as I deem it of the utmost importance, for the security of the titles to the property owned by the inhabitants of this province, that the only evidence (which is the records) that will be recognised by my Government should remain a permanent basis of security to them in their possession. I will now take up the subject of your Excellency's note of yesterday, and will inform you the sloop Endeavor, of forty tons, has been procured for the purpose of affording additional accommodations to the families of the officers, and also to transport the ammunition and stores contemplated by our mutual understandings, and which I had the honor, at your request, to send you yesterday for examination. The captain of this vessel will be instructed to report to you early on to-morrow, and take your orders. Enclosed your Excellency will find an estimate of the provisions to be furnished on my part, embracing also their kinds and component parts, which will afford you the information desired. You will also receive a memorandum of the accommodations afforded by the transports, and I am persuaded that you will discover the propriety of placing the military officers who have families on board the Meteor, as the accommodations are entirely private, each state room having a Venetian door, and unconnected with each other. The cabin accommodations of the sloop also afford much convenience, as you will readily perceive. As you were pleased to express yourself satisfied with these accommodations in our conversation yesterday, I shall be gratified to know that you continue so. It may be of some importance to the officer commanding the United States convoy to have completed at an early day the arrangements necessary for the government of the fleet. I hope you will afford the information on that head as soon as possible. After expressing my thanks for the exertions you are daily making to facilitate my wishes, I conclude with a hope that you will make a request of the Captain General that the transports shall enter Havana and disembark free of duties.

United States Commissioner.

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

St. AUGUSTINE, June 23, 1821.

SIR: In answer to your esteemed note of yesterday, I assure your Excellency, as I mentioned in my letter of the 19th, that until I receive the answer of my Government on the doubts arising on the delivery of the public archives relating to the individual property of the inhabitants of this province, and on which I have on this date written for information, they shall not be removed from this place, and they shall remain precisely as they are. I shall likewise remain here until this point is decided, as well as on that of the artillery, on which I have made my report; and, in the mean time, I will have formed an exact inventory of the documents contained in those archives. I will inform his Excellency the Captain General of Cuba of the sentiments your Excellency has expressed respecting the rights of the inhabitants holding property here; and I will likewise lay before him the question embraced in the last paragraph of your Excellency's letter: whether the American transports entering the port of Havana shall be free of duties? I have noted the object to which your Excellency has destined the sloop Endeavor, and will give orders that her loading shall be entered on as soon as possible; but the article of powder will be reserved until the last moment, in order to diminish the danger of accidents; and, for the same reason, it appears to me a matter of prudence that no other person should be entered on board of her than the necessary crew; and that the families of the civil officers may not thereby be cramped in their accommodations, I will distribute them in the vessels freighted on my part for the transportation of the cannon, bombs, &c., if your Excellency will have the goodness to cause them to be supplied with the rations, &c., for the voyage; and, with this view, I will give you timely notice of the distribution I may make. The conveniences of the Meteor will be appropriated to the military; but, as we have separately agreed, the colored troops will be shipped in the transports I have freighted, and for which I hope your Excellency will be pleased to order rations to be in readiness for delivery according to advice I shall communicate in proper time. I appreciate the statement that accompanied your letter for my information; and, advertent to that of rations, (which is calculated for a voyage of twenty days,) your Excellency will pardon my making the observation that, in the present season of the year, they are frequently extended to thirty days, and more. Experience affords the example of vessels having to return here after being twenty-five days at sea; and, for this very reason, the packet schooner of this Government, (the Barbarita,) when sailing to the Havana in these months, is supplied with rations for forty days. I have conceived it proper to state these circumstances for your Excellency's information. Annexed is a statement of the vessels for which I have solicited convoy, and which I transmit for the purpose your Excellency has expressed;

and I have much pleasure in assuring you of my particular respect and consideration.

God preserve your Excellency many years.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 26, [27.] 1821.

SIR: I received your esteemed note of the 23d, in answer to mine of the 22d. I was desirous to have a conversation with you previous to writing you again, and am thereby enabled to give you more satisfactory information touching some of the points contained in your last. The subject of the archives relating to individual property I consider perfectly understood between us, and will, therefore, remain silent on that head until you receive the further instructions of your Government in relation thereto. I return you my sincere thanks for your promise to communicate my sentiments on that subject to the Captain General, also my hopes that the American transports would be permitted to enter the Havana free of duties. I have thought it advisable to order an additional transport, fearing, from our late conversation, that the one furnished would not be sufficient, and also with a view of evidencing my wishes to render comfortable the families of the civil officers. You have been pleased to express your entire satisfaction with this arrangement, and that no more will be required of me. I shall pay the necessary regard to the suggestion made by your Excellency on the subject of provisions, and shall use every means in my power to afford ample supplies to guard against accidents. In making my estimate, I was governed by the information of a number of sea captains, who all agreed that twenty days would be ample and liberal; but I hope I shall be able to correct the estimate, and afford you about thirty days' supply. The provisions will be turned over to your commissary by the commissary of the United States, and receipts required therefor; after which, the officer commanding the detachment can regulate the distribution to the different vessels as you may require. The understanding which now happily exists between us leaves me nothing further to communicate upon, except the preparation for the delivery, and the contemplated receipts to be passed between us on that subject; and I have only to request that you will fix upon some early day for the delivery, corresponding with your necessary convenience, and the assurances which you have been pleased to make me personally; and any suggestion which you may be pleased to make with respect to the manner differing from our mutual understanding shall be happily received and duly considered.

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA,
June 28, 1821.

SIR: With much esteem I received your Excellency's note of yesterday, bearing testimony to the unanimity of our sentiments. You will do me a favor in directing the captains of the vessels you have freighted to transport the stores to come forward and receive their loading, as that part of the business is delayed, and a part of the effects are in waiting on the shore. It would be very pleasing to me to comply with your request in appointing a day for the exchange of flags, but I fear to adventure on my judgment, as that depends on the shipment of the artillery, which, although progressing as fast as possible, might be delayed by a change of weather, and other occurrences with the captains of the vessels might render our efforts abortive. However, I will not lose sight of that request; and, as soon as a farther progression will warrant a calculation, I will inform you of it. As we accord on all the other contents of your Excellency's note, which I am answering, I shall use the freedom and friendly understanding that guide us in making known to your Excellency the following: Having given to the officers of this garrison the necessary information of the number, quantity, and quality of the rations that you offer for their voyage, they have represented to me that those rations are not suitable to their situations, and they claim to be supplied as His Catholic Majesty has provided by the regulations of the 18th July, 1805, which allow a board gratuity of thirty days from this to the Havana, at two dollars per day, with the allowance of more, should it be required, but liable to no deduction should the expenses be less; and this excludes the rations of the officers: they will only receive those stated for their wives and children, as they are equivalent to the allowance made by the Spanish Government for their families in similar cases. I therefore make it known to your Excellency, in the hope that you will be pleased to inform me, should you have no objection to supply the officers with the gratuity they claim, founded in justice, in order to their immediately receiving the same from the person your Excellency will inform me of; but, should it be otherwise, your Excellency is informed that it does not suit them, for the reasons stated, to receive those rations, and they hold their right of claim on the Spanish Government for their board allowance provided in those cases. I present your Excellency a reiteration of my particular respects and high consideration.

God preserve your Excellency many years.

ST. AUGUSTINE, June 29, 1821.

SIR: I have received your Excellency's note of yesterday, in which you decline, for the present, appointing a day for the exchange of flags, and desire that the captains of the vessels I have freighted to transport the stores should be required to come forward to receive their loading, as that part of the business was delayed. I deem it necessary to remark to your Excellency, that the sloop Endeavor was procured for that purpose, and required to report for your orders; and, in a conversation had with you some days since, you were pleased to remark, that, should this vessel not be sufficient to transport those stores, you would dispose of the overplus in your vessels. In a subsequent conversation, you were pleased to signify that one vessel would not be sufficient, and alleged that no passengers would go on board the Endeavor, in consequence of her loading being principally powder; upon which I informed you that I would procure another vessel to take the balance of the stores, and to accommodate passengers. I have procured the promised vessel, and she will be ready to receive her freight early in the morning. You are pleased to inform me that the shipment of the artillery, although progressing as fast as possible, might be delayed by a change of weather; and as I observe, also, that but few of your balls, &c., have been put on board of your vessels, I feel somewhat at a loss to understand how any delay could have arisen on my part. I have deemed the foregoing observations necessary to exonerate me from any imputation of neglect of duty on the part of my Government, which your note is calculated to warrant. In answer to that part of your Excellency's note which relates to the allowance of a gratuity of thirty days, at two dollars per day, on the part of your Government to the officers, for their passage to the Havana, I can only remark that my instructions confine me to the furnishing provisions under certain conditions, and that those provisions will be placed in the possession of your commissary, subject to such disposition as you may think proper to make of them. I appreciate your Excellency's promise to give me, as early as possible, the information required as to the day for the exchange of flags; and will remark, in conclusion, that the transport has again arrived off this harbor, with the troops destined to occupy this province.

I renew to your Excellency my sentiments of great consideration and personal esteem.

No. 24.

Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler.

ST. AUGUSTINE, E. F., June 30, 1821.

I am satisfied that, on the part of your Excellency, there has been no delay in making the arrangements relative to the transportation of the stores. The object of my observation on that point was, that your Excellency would be pleased to notify the captains of the vessels you have freighted to appear and receive their cargoes, as a part of what they were to take was some days on the shore, ready for embarkation; for, although the captain of the sloop Endeavor did present himself immediately after your Excellency gave me notice that he was freighted for that purpose, he told me that he had to grave his vessel's bottom before taking in her load. She has now a part of her load on board. But, although your Excellency informed me of your having freighted another vessel on the 27th, as one was not sufficient to transport the whole, I do not yet know who the captain is, as he had not made his appearance this morning at ten o'clock. It is certain that I have still balls to ship; but this does not prevent going on, at the same time, with the shipment of the stores. This explanation will always show that neither on your part nor mine has there been any neglect in the prompt execution of our respective duties. When, in our conversations, we spoke of articles being shipped in my transports, it was under the impression that they would comprehend some small quantity, not adequate to the loading of another vessel, and which could be taken on board of my transports without inconvenience. Our official notes all terminated on this point, and to them reference may be had; but, in comprobatation of my offer, I can cite to your Excellency that a part of the equipage of the troops is already shipped in my transports.

It being my duty to attend to the representation of my officers respecting their non-admittance of the kind of rations your Excellency proffers to them; as I must conceive, from the answer your Excellency has been pleased to give me on the subject, that you have not the power of altering what you have offered, I have resolved leaving to my Government the right of claim on your Government, in this case, as it may judge proper, to supply the aforesaid officers with the table allowance the Spanish nation has provided for them; consequently, the proposed rations will not be received, and those to be received for the other classes should, it appears to me, be served out on the voyage by the person who may have them in charge for the American Government, excepting such as are to be distributed among my transports, which will be received by the commissary I will appoint, and who will apply to your Excellency to that effect, with the necessary notice and instructions, immediately after your Excellency shall have, as I hope, informed me of your accordance. According to the arrangements made, the troops that are to occupy this province being in front of this port, I expect that on the 8th or 10th the evacuation may be effected by mine, and the possession concluded that I am to deliver to your Excellency, as the commissioner to receive the same. I am preparing the documents receptive by this important act; those of the other part of the possession being already realized, of which I wish to know if your Excellency is satisfied. I am this moment informed that the last vessel which your Excellency informed me of having freighted, and of which I have made mention in the first part of this letter, has appeared, and is taking in her cargo. I ratify the distinguished conception and particular estimation I have of your Excellency.

God preserve you many years.

SIR: I have received your note of the 30th ultimo. The observations you are pleased to make on the subject of the transports are satisfactory. As the officers of the Spanish Government refuse to receive the American rations, I deem it necessary to require that you will be pleased to furnish me with a report of the persons who are to sail, that will be entitled to receive rations, that I can have the quantity set apart, ready for the reception of your commissary, as the United States do not furnish a commissary but to their own troops or prisoners of war, and it will be therefore necessary that you authorize some officer to receive and receipt for the provisions on the part of your Government. I shall give you an expression of my sentiments in relation to the documents, of which you say the possession is already realized, as soon as I shall be enabled to have them translated, that I can understand them perfectly. I cannot omit the expression of my thanks to your Excellency for having given the 10th instant as the longest period set apart for the exchange of flags, but still entertain great hopes that your business will be sooner completed, and hereby enable you to fulfil my wishes at an earlier day.

I have the honor to renew to your Excellency the assurances of my great respect and distinguished consideration.

His Ex'cy DON JOSE COPPINGER,

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 3, 1821.

Your Excellency informs me, in your official letter of yesterday, that your Government only supplies a commissary for the distribution of rations to its own troops and prisoners of war. Although I am not disposed to differ from your opinion, I would observe that the supplies your Excellency provides for my troops may overrun or fall short, according to what may be the length of the voyage. Should they overrun, I do not know if it is the intention of your Government to reclaim the balance; should they fall short, it is a matter of course that the deficiency is to be made good to those who wanted; and it may occur that the convey will have to seek a port and procure provisions to continue the voyage; consequently, I conclude that, as the American Government, on whose account the transportation is made, becomes the responsible party in either of the two latter cases, it ought to have the advantage in the event of the former. These reasons have induced me to believe that your Excellency would furnish an issuing commissary to the completion of this engagement. But, if your Excellency continue in the same opinion, I will appoint a person to wait on your Excellency with the statement you call for, and take charge of the rations, leaving to my Government the right of claiming the deficiency that may arise from future contingencies. Should it be possible for me to abbreviate the arrangement for the exchange of flags, which I have intimated in my former letter, informing you of it will afford me much pleasure. I remain, with the highest personal esteem.

God preserve you many years.

SIR: That a more perfect understanding should exist between us, in relation to the archives which are embraced in the treaty of cession, and relating to individual property, is the object of this communication. I should, upon mature reflection, consider myself wanting in my duty to the inhabitants of this province, who are about to become citizens of my Government, if I withheld any statement in relation to the archives which might lead to the removal of any documents that would be of importance to their security, and which my Government considers included in the treaty. The following records are deemed indispensable to this object, viz: The royal or other orders, authorizing the Governors of this province to issue grants to individuals for lands, lots or squares; the evidence of indemnity offered by Great Britain, to her subjects who might leave their property in this province, and retire to her territory after the cession to Spain; the proclamation of the Spanish authorities, calling on those individuals to come forward and dispose of their property, or peaceably occupy it within certain periods, or the same would be confiscated, and the order of confiscation thereafter; the original records of all grants made in the province, either by His Catholic Majesty, the Captain General of Cuba, or the Governors of this province, respectively; the original records of all trials and decisions embracing individual property; and the original records relating to the execution of wills and administration of estates. The foregoing explanation is given to show you what I am bound to consider as the archives relating to individual property, and which are not to be removed from this place until the decision is had on the subject by our respective Governments; and I request that you will cause the Captain General to be furnished with a copy of this communication.

The note your Excellency was pleased to send me yesterday, in order to point out which are the records comprehended in the treaty of cession, and appertaining to private property, I have duly examined, and have to answer, that, confining myself to a compliance with the treaty, and with the orders of my Government, their liberal sense is the only guide to my endeavor in the execution; and, when any doubts arise, I consult them with that frankness necessary to ascertain my course and warrant my responsibility. Thus actuated, I early informed your Excellency with respect to the public archives in the escribano's office, or records bearing on private property of the inhabitants of this province—measures to which your Excellency was pleased to accede. It now appears that your Excellency advances pretensions to other documents, that I am sorry to say are, according to my conception, excluded from the delivery. I do not comprehend the ground on which you step your demand; therefore, and in order to report to my Government, by the earliest opportunity, that it may decide with yours on these points, and, at the same time, on those others in question, your Excellency will excuse my not entering into particular observations on each of these. I have much pleasure in repeating to your Excellency my constant esteem.

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 5, 1821.

SIR: I have read with attention your Excellency's note of the 3d instant, and, in answer, have to remark, that you will please to appoint a commissary to receive the provisions from the commissary of the United States, and receipt for the same. As the transports are to be discharged at the Havana, the surplus provisions could not be reclaimed by the United States; hence, the supplies required by your Excellency will be furnished, and remain subject to the decisions of our respective Governments, as heretofore stipulated between us. I desire to be furnished, as soon as possible, with the estimate, as I am making arrangements for the removal of the surplus provisions from the transport, and entering into the necessary preparations for the exchange on Tuesday next, as advised by you. I enclose you a form required by Captain Ramage for the execution of the three captains of vessels to be convoyed, and hope you will have it entered into without delay, as he is desirous to have his instructions prepared immediately. In answer to the note of yesterday which your Excellency has done me the honor to address me, I beg leave to remark, that the only ground assumed on my part, in making the communication of the 3d instant, was, that of the faithful performance of my duty to my Government, and the individuals who are about to become citizens thereof; and I did not expect you to enter into particular observations on the subject of that letter, but I wished to give you timely information of what documents I considered to be the archives in our arrangement, and would be esteemed under the treaty sufficient to guaranty the possession of the inhabitants in their property; and that they might not be removed until the decision was had on the subject, when I could adopt such further amicable measures as are warranted by my instructions. If I comprehend your Excellency aright, it is, that you will communicate a copy of that letter, as requested, to the Captain General of Cuba.

I have the honor to renew to your Excellency the assurances of my great respect and high consideration.

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 6, 1821.

I have appointed Don Juan Jose Robles, store-keeper general, to receive the rations from the commissary of the United States; and he has orders to present himself to your Excellency, without delay, to receive your directions to the person who will deliver them. Annexed you have minutes expressive of the daily allowance to be consumed on the voyage: your Excellency will thereby see that the amount is less than should be expected from the statement I gave you of the garrison and civil officers, which arises from the military officers not receiving rations, and a part of the civil officers being unable to move for the present. I am sorry that, at the conclusion of this business, we are not more on accord, as appears by your Excellency's expression of yesterday: "As the transports are to be discharged at the Havana, the surplus provisions cannot be reclaimed by the United States; therefore, the supplies required by your Excellency will be delivered, and remain subject to the determination of our Governments, as has been stipulated between us." As to the first part of this position, your Excellency will be at liberty to reclaim or leave the provisions that will become a surplus, should the voyage fall short of the thirty days mentioned in my letter of the 3d; but, as it relates to supplies, I have not called for any; I have only requested that there should be provided, on your part, the provisions necessary to meet the wants of the voyage, should it exceed thirty days; so that not receiving (and there will not be received) more rations than for the persons your Excellency has spontaneously offered to supply, our Governments can only have to decide, relative to provisions, on those not received by my officers, and those your Excellency will furnish the two sloops chartered on account of yours to transport the stores; and on this last article it was that we had our accord. This I have stated in explanation of that part of your letter of yesterday that I have cited here.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

I have made the communication, to which the note I have the honor of answering has reference, respecting the archives, and in the same manner that your Excellency has been pleased to express in its two last paragraphs. As early as possible, I will transmit your Excellency the documents to be executed by the captains of the vessels that go under convoy, as requested by James Ramage, Esq., as it is my intention to deliver your Excellency possession of the territory on the 10th of this month. You will be pleased to arrange for the coming forward, to-morrow, of the detachments that are to receive Matanzas and the look-out house, to get the necessary orders, and pass to the occupancy of these said posts.

I remain yours, &c. God preserve you many years.

SIR: Your letter, bearing date the 6th instant, with the documents therein referred to, I had the honor to receive yesterday. The gentleman appointed to receive the provisions by your Excellency has presented himself, and the commissary of the United States has been furnished with the necessary orders to make the delivery. Your Excellency has not understood my expression about the supplies required by you; it had allusion only to the provisions which your estimate would call for to subsist the troops to the Havana. Lieutenant Wells has been ordered to receive the look-out house, and Lieutenant Davidson the works at Matanzas, and they are required to present themselves to your Excellency for this purpose. Your last note, relating to the detention of the American schooner Stamper, in consequence of her having slaves on board, was received yesterday, just as I had concluded a letter on that subject to the commanding officer of the Porpoise. I am happy to find that he has thought proper to release the vessel, under existing circumstances, as there was evidently no intention of fraud in bringing those servants, and the difficulty arose entirely from the ignorance of the law of 1818 governing the shipment of slaves.

I have the honor to be, with esteem, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

This instrument is according to our understanding on this subject, and I hope you will be pleased to pass the information to James Ramage, Esq., commander of the convoy. I have made all the arrangements in order to verify the exchange of flags on the forenoon of the 10th instant, and to that effect my troops will embark to-morrow, leaving only the guards of the forts, parade, and magazine, which will be relieved by yours in the time, form, and number, we have agreed on.

Permit me to request that the provisions for the voyage may be delivered to the commissary I have appointed, to-day, if possible. I reiterate to your Excellency my particular consideration and respect.

I had communicated to the officer commanding the troops to organize his guards for the relief of yours, to correspond as nearly as the customs of our service approach to your organization. Captain Ramage has received due notice, and I had given an early order for turning over the provisions. Your Excellency will now permit me to tender you my congratulations at the prospect of the happy conclusion of our respective duties which to-morrow will afford us, in executing finally the important document of interchange of authority, and to assure you that I shall ever bear in mind the friendly manifestations you have been pleased to make me, since the commencement of our intercourse; and renew to you the expressions of my great respect and personal consideration.

Act of Cession.

In the place of St. Augustine, and on the tenth day of July, eighteen hundred and twenty-one, Don Jose Coppinger, colonel of the national armies, and commissioner appointed by his Excellency the Captain General of the island of Cuba to make a formal delivery of this said place and province of East Florida to the Government of the United States of America, by virtue of the treaty of cession concluded at Washington on the twenty-second of February, eighteen hundred and nineteen, and the royal schedule of delivery of the twenty-fourth of October, of the last year, annexed to the documents mentioned in the certificate, that form a heading to the instruments in testimony thereof; and the adjutant general of the southern division of said States, Colonel Don Robert Butler, duly authorized by the aforesaid Government to receive the same. We having had several conferences, in order to carry into effect our respective commissions, as will appear by our official communications, and having received by the latter the documents, inventories, and plans appertaining to the property and sovereignty of the Spanish nation, held in the province, and in its adjacent islands depending thereon, with the sites, public squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, and other works, not being private property, and the same having been preceded by the arrangements and formalities that, for the greater solemnity of this important act, they have judged proper: there has been verified, at four o'clock of the evening of this day, the complete and personal delivery of the fortifications, and all else of this aforesaid province, to the commissioner, officers, and troops of the United States; and, in consequence thereof, have embarked for the Havana the military and civil officers and Spanish troops, in the American transports provided for this purpose, the Spanish authorities having this moment ceased the exercise of their functions, and those appointed by the American Government having begun theirs; duly noting that we have transmitted to our Governments the doubts occurring whether the artillery ought to be comprehended in the fortifications, and if the public archives relating to private property ought to remain, and be delivered to the American Government, by virtue of the cession; and that there remain in the fortifications, until the aforesaid resolution is made, the artillery, munitions, and implements, specified in a particular inventory; awaiting, on these points, and the others appearing in question in our correspondence, the superior decision of our respective Governments, and which is to have, whatever may be the result, the most religious compliance at any time it may arrive, and in which the possession that at present appears given shall not serve as an obstacle.

In testimony of which, and that this may at all times serve as an expressive and formal receipt in this act, we, the subscribing commissioners, sign four instruments of this same tenor, in the English and Spanish languages, at the above mentioned place, and said day, month, and year.

ROBERT BUTLER,
JOSE COPPINGER.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Worthington, Secretary and acting Governor of East Florida, to the Secretary of State, dated

ST. AUGUSTINE, October 9, 1821.

I enclose you an account of my proceedings in the case of the archives and documents which I have seized here. The separation of the papers is not yet accomplished. I must confess I regarded the Spanish officers remaining here more as a matter of speculative intrigue and espionage than any thing else. Since this last blow, the ex-Governor, whom I look upon as no better than the general run of Spanish provincial Governors, has taken his departure, and I suppose many discontented Spaniards will follow his example. He and myself had a little dispute about a man of the name of Ugarte, the particulars of which I will send on, lest the affair should be misrepresented, for I am conscious of being correct in the procedure.

No. 1.

Mr. Worthington to Mr. Entralgo.

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 29, 1821.

SIR: Having, on my arrival here, understood that you had exercised the office of alcalde and notary, and that a large portion of the public archives and private records of this province were under your safe keeping, I immediately endeavored to find out in what state this subject had been placed by our Commissioner, Colonel Butler, on the cession of East Florida.

It seems that the subject had been referred by him and the ex-Governor, Colonel Coppinger, to the decision of the United States Government, at Washington, and the Captain General of the island of Cuba.

Whether this disposition by those two officers would be deemed a sufficient justification for me to consider this important matter out of my cognizance, until I should be specifically instructed on it, would be a question of not much consequence, if no inconvenience in the mean time was suffered by the delay. But, as it is considered that much inconvenience does grow out of the present situation of the archives and records, placed as they are, I deem it my duty, as legally authorized to exercise the functions of the late Spanish Governor of East Florida, to request that all the archives, records, and documents, (within your control or knowledge,) by virtue of the treaty between the United States and Spain ceding these provinces, and according to the customs and usages of civilized nations, may, in good faith and perfect amity, be passed over from the officers of Spain to the proper civil officer of the United States.

On the receipt of your letter of the 22d, I was of opinion that your peculiar situation would render it necessary to appoint some person to the place of alcalde; and, on the 28th instant, I received a letter from Governor Jackson, at Pensacola, stating that the Spanish subjects had declined taking the oaths of office to the United States, fearing that would operate as a relinquishment of their rights as Spanish subjects, and that he had appointed Judge Brackenridge alcalde there, who had received the archives. Not doubting from your letter that you had taken the same ground, I appointed Edmund Law, Esq., as alcalde and notary; he is expected here every hour. In the mean time, my private secretary will take charge, in my name, of all the archives and documents which ought to pass over with this province, and will sign a proper receipt therefor.

You mentioned you had a claim on those documents. I presume nothing can be clearer than that you must look to the Spanish Government for indemnification. But if the United States are liable to pay you, the transferring by you of the archives and documents to the proper person cannot impair your claim; so that, taking the subject in every point of view, I cannot see how any of the public archives or documents could have been delayed to be given up. If I had been appointed to accept the cession, I should have declined taking the territory without the archives, documents, &c.

As the ex-Governor, Colonel Coppinger, though still in this city, may not consider himself as holding any of the archives and public documents, so as to be addressed officially, and as this letter is intended to embrace and refer to all the archives and public documents of every kind which are yet undelivered and may remain in the hands of any of the Spanish officers, I must request you, as late an officer under him, to communicate this to him in extenso, as it is presumed that both of the Governments, and their officers, are inclined to give every facility to the officers of each other in their power, regarding matter of substance rather than etiquette or matter of form.

Very respectfully,

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,

Sec'y and acting Gov. of E. F.

No. 2.

Mr. Entralgo to Mr. Worthington.

ST. AUGUSTINE, Sept. 5, 1821.

SIR: It is an incontrovertible axiom of justice that, while any affair is pending before the cognizance and for the decision of a supreme tribunal, it ought not to be innovated upon; as a contrary course would be violent, improper, null, and of no effect. Under this idea, and considering what was expressed in your official note of the 29th of August last, which I received yesterday evening at 6 o'clock, wherein you appear to be aware that the doubts arising between the commissioners, Colonels Jose Coppinger and Robert Butler, respecting the delivery of the archives under my charge, have been referred to the Government of the United States, at Washington, and to his Excellency the Captain General of the island of Cuba; I do not consider it in the power of any subaltern authority to deprive me of the possession of the said archives, particularly as I have no idea of carrying away or disposing of them during the deliberation of the supreme authorities; and as their remaining here cannot occasion any prejudice to the public, who are more interested in their preservation than the Government; and if the parties require copies, I am ready to certify them, on payment of my proper fees.

The precedent which you point out to me, of the receipt of the public archives by the Government of Pensacola, cannot be a rule that the same should be done here, because the parallel circumstances do not apply.

In Pensacola, the office had no head, nor was there any notary public. Here, I have received from Government public documents and registers, which archives and protocols I bought at public sale; consequently, I am the legal head of the office, and nothing can deprive me of the use and benefit thereof, until I have been first satisfactorily indemnified, because they are private property, which have no connexion with the archives and documents directly relating to the property and sovereignty of this province; which genuine and literal words, stated in the second article of the treaty of amity concluded at Washington on the 22d of February, 1819, must guide any one wishing to ascertain the facts.

I trust, sir, that, from your well known judgment and deliberate consideration, and having in view what I have thus laid before you, you will be pleased to suspend all proceedings tending to deprive me of my property, until the decision of the supreme authorities, to whose cognizance have also been referred the representations which I have more extensively made upon this head, and until the receipt of the necessary papers containing their decision.

With every respect, &c.

JUAN DE ENTRALGO.

No. 3.

Mr. Worthington to Mr. Entralgo.

ST. AUGUSTINE, September 15, 1821.

SIR: I have thus long delayed noticing your letter of the 5th instant, under a hope that, ere this, a definitive arrangement might have closed the controversy concerning the office contemplated in General Jackson's 4th ordinance, section 8th, which has been held by you under the Spanish Government, and to which Mr. Edmund Law has been appointed, on the 28th ultimo, under a commission from General Jackson, acting as Governor of the Floridas, and with the powers of the Captain General of the island of Cuba. My letter of the 29th ultimo informed you of that fact, and I introduced Mr. Law as that officer, personally, to you, I think, on the 7th instant. You still not only retain the papers of that office, but exercise the functions and receive the fees you were accustomed to do under the Spanish Government, and this, too, after this territory has ceased to belong to the King of Spain; after it is organized under the sovereignty of the United States, and has become their property, where no person holds an office unless having first taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and after (in your letter of the 22d ultimo) you had declined taking that oath; and after your knowing, both by letter from me, and verbally, that Mr. Law is the present person who fills that office, and, of course, you must, to every official purpose, be functus officio since his appointment. In your letter of the 5th to me, you set out with stating what you call an incontrovertible axiom of right, (axioma inconcusso de derecho), which, though it is an abstract opinion, I think unsound, even as a general rule, much less as being conclusive on the point in controversy. I look upon the commissioners, either to cede or receive the province of East Florida, not of higher authority than myself, appointed by the President as the secretary of the province, and by General Jackson, exercising the powers of the Captain General of the island of Cuba, vesting in me the powers of the late Spanish Governor of this province of East Florida. The commissioners, I presume, were neither appointed by the President nor by the King; so that, to support your "axioma inconcusso," you should have shown that, for the reference to bind absolutely the Governor of this province, it was properly made by an authority higher than his. At most, the commissioners and the Governor, even quoad that particular subject, are coequal, any matter of expediency growing out of it, affecting the welfare and happiness of the province, passes under the cognizance of the Governor.

Your expressions "violento, vicioso," &c., were not warranted, either by my acts or writings, respecting you or the office, nor did I expect such from you; for, to do them justice, I have always esteemed politeness as a trait in the Spanish nation. But epithets of this sort are what I am neither in my public nor private character in the habit of receiving. You will therefore be pleased, if it be necessary to say any thing further to me, to dispense with that kind of language.

I, therefore, on the first point, (the matter of reference of the commissioners,) come to this conclusion: that, acting as the Governor of this province, whenever I deem it necessary for the good and interest of the people of this territory to make any order respecting the archives, documents, &c., even pending the reference, I have the power to do so; and am only responsible for that, as well as every other official act, to the President, the Governor of the Floridas, and the American people. Respect and delicacy towards the commissioners would make me not rashly or imprudently, I trust, interfere; but, should I feel it my duty, I will risk all responsibility.

Now, sir, as to the right of your retaining what you say you received from the Government—"public documents and registers, which archives and protocols," you say, you bought at public sale; that they are private property, cannot be taken away from you without your being first satisfactorily indemnified.

I have no hesitation in saying that, according to the law of nations, and under the usages and customs of nations in their changes of property and sovereignty, it is a necessary incident to that sovereignty that the archives and documents in a country, which (though you may have bought the usufruct) are, in fact, the property of the community, must pass to the Government, to whom the sovereignty and property of the conquered or ceded territory passes. The second article says positively what shall pass—"archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the ceded provinces." It is not to be inferred that the intention of the parties who made the treaty was thereby to exclude all of the archives and documents which belong incidentally to that property and sovereignty, and which, according to the usages and customs of nations, as belonging to the people of the ceded territory, pass with it. The little trite legal maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, cannot govern in construing compacts between nations, which are to be interpreted according to the broad and liberal rules of national law, and the just principles of natural justice.

I understand the archives and documents you hold are, for instance, the original grants for lands, &c., deeds from one individual to another, the original last wills and testaments of the inhabitants of this province, &c.; that they were lodged in your office by the owners of them, for your trouble in receiving and filing or recording which you received the legal fees, and gave copies to persons who required them, and received your charge for that service; that in the office you retained the originals; that, on the decease of your predecessor, the situation or the privilege which he held was, for the benefit of his family, set up to public sale; that you gave about $600 for it; that you have held it eight or nine years, and it is said to have yielded you from about $15,000 to $20,000, at the least, in that time; that now you decline giving it up, unless you are paid about $3,000 for it. If this statement be incorrect, I will, with great pleasure, on being truly informed, alter it to suit the real state of the facts. I have had it from persons who might be supposed to know, and on whose information and veracity I have great reliance.

Saying nothing against a Government setting up an office of profit, high trust, and confidence, of this kind, to public auction, (because independent nations have a right to manage their internal affairs, generally, in their own way,) and looking on your purchase of it perfectly fair and justifiable, I should think that the nation which first sells it to you, and then sells it from you, must be the one to indemnify you. For every person, either civil or military, who may have purchased a place or commission from a Government selling a province, which becomes extinguished or superseded by the administration of the Government purchasing, might, under this rule, claim an indemnity. The doctrine, I think, in the general, too monstrous for a moment to be tolerated, and I think your claim in the particular cannot be supported; because I look on those archives and documents not as your property, but as originals belonging to the community—to the individuals who lodged them with you, having paid you for the filing and recording, also for your certified copies; so that you took the office or the privilege subject to the chance of its being transferred by Spain to the United States; and, I suspect, the uncertainty and probable shortness when that event might take place was the cause of your purchasing it so low; therefore, not only the law, but the equity is against you.

These are my principal reasons why the archives and public documents should not remain in the hands of an officer of the nation who has sold. He is not like one of its own citizens, entirely amenable to the purchasing Government; indeed, he may be hostile to it. And although, for myself, I feel perfectly safe in confiding in your honor and integrity, while the archives and documents remain with you, yet, if this case of yours is to become a precedent in other negotiations of this kind, archives and documents might be withheld in the hands of public officers who might destroy, alter, or mutilate them; for instance, might falsify or antedate grants of lands, &c.

Another reason: on seeing the fees of office which have been charged under the Spanish Government, the United States Government might wish to increase or diminish them, so as to suit the state of things.

In less than twenty years the United States have purchased the whole of Louisiana, Florida, &c. His Britannic Majesty may, in less than that time, wish to sell the Canadas; or His Catholic Majesty, Cuba or Texas; or the United States may, before that time, possibly, retrocede some of its possessions to these Powers. I wish, therefore, whether those events ever occur or not, to enter this now as my solemn protest against the present case being considered as an acquiescence in the right of property of the archives and documents being retained by you, or your still receiving their usufruct, unless you had been specially appointed by our Government, or were still holding it under the construction of General Jackson's proclamation of the 1st of July. But this has been superseded by the appointment of Mr. Law; so that, on a retrocession, I should hold up my hand as much against an American holding over an office in this way as against an Englishman or Spaniard; for, although I have as high confidence in the integrity of an Englishman as any one, yet I would not afford a precedent of this kind.

The history of Lord Verulam, the high chancellor of England, shows that no rank nor talents can secure a man against malversation in office; which, if it happened to one whom Mr. Pope has called "the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind," it is only discreet to avoid placing any one in the way of temptation. Having stated that the King of Spain, under the treaty of Washington, as necessarily incidental to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas, by the spirit of the treaty, under the usages and customs of nations, notwithstanding the apparent specification in the second article, has passed over all archives and documents which are common property to the people of these provinces, and that those in your office are of that character, I will now show you that, by the law of nations, he had a right to do so.

It would be useless to make a parade of learning, by referring to a large list of writers who are uniform in this doctrine. Vattel happens to be on my desk. In his treatise on the Law of Nations, and applied to the conduct of nations and sovereigns, in book 1, chap. 21, sect. 262, he says: "That it is necessary that nations should treat and transact their affairs with validity; without which they could have no method of terminating them, and of placing themselves in a state of tranquillity; whence it follows that, when a nation has ceded any part of its property to another, the cession ought to be held as valid and irrevocable, as it is done in virtue of the notion of property. This principle cannot be shaken by any fundamental law, by means of which a nation might pretend to deprive itself of the power of alienating what belongs to itself; for this would be to forbid all contracts with other nations, or to pretend to deceive them. A nation, with such a law, ought never to treat of its property; if it is obliged to it by necessity, or determined to do it for its own advantage, it must renounce its fundamental law. It is seldom disputed that an entire nation may alienate what belongs to itself; but it is asked if its conductor, if its sovereign, has this power? The question may be determined by the fundamental laws, if the laws say nothing directly on this subject. This will be explained in our second principle.

"If the nation has conferred the full sovereignty on its conductor; if it has committed the care of it to him, and has, without reserve, given him the right of treating and contracting with other States, it is considered as having invested him with all the powers necessary to make a valid contract. The prince is then the organ of the nation; what he does, is reputed done by itself; and, although he is not the proprietor of the public property, his alienations are valid, as being duly authorized."

Now, sir, even if this peculiar custom of Spain, the considering this office that you hold private property, were a fundamental law of the kingdom, I conceive that the transfer by the sovereign, under this construction of the law of nations, would pass over to the United States, under the "notion of property," the archives and documents in it being of common use to, and the original property of, the inhabitants of the territory; unless, in the treaty, special mention had been made of them, and they had been excepted. If these archives and documents would have passed, under the custom of nations; if the words "which relate directly" had been omitted—the introduction of those words cannot alter the great rules of right and construction which exist amongst civilized, high-minded, and just nations, in the exposition of their contracts; otherwise, those words must be regarded as a matter of catch and legal quibble, fit for cunning and litigious individuals, and cannot be imputed to the Spanish sovereign, or to the Chevalier de Onis, who drew it up. Those words were to specify, pointedly, certain archives and documents, without excluding or abridging the right to others which may and ought to belong to the purchasing nation, as of primary or secondary importance to the citizens who are incorporated under the treaty. Even in our ordinary grants, deeds, muniments, &c. of title, &c. pass to the grantee, and the contract is construed most strictly against the grantor; this rule equally applies to nations. Admit, for a moment, that the archives and documents, or the office, is your private property; that you can do what you choose with it—and you may take it to the Havana, or the Pyrenees, and the citizens of this province would have to go there to investigate their titles, &c., and have foreign fees, charges, &c., entailed on them and their posterity. This is what neither the King of Spain nor this treaty could have intended. It would be a transfer surrounded with absurdity, and deficient in good faith, which I am not disposed to impute to His Catholic Majesty or his Ministers. On the whole, as I told you on my first interview, I do not blame you, if you think yourself fully entitled to remuneration, to get it; and I repeat, your own Government is, in my mind, the party you have to look to. What, I am sorry to say, I must differ with you in, is, that you should not have given up the archives and documents to the officer who has been appointed under the United States Government. Your claim neither against them nor Spain could be weakened in the least by that act. Indeed, I think it would have been placed in a higher and more favorable light; because you cannot for a moment think that either of those nations, after the archives passed over from you, would be less prompt and just towards you than if you held them fast in your own hands. Pass them over, make out your claim against either or both Governments, and I am certain justice will be done in the premises. If you are entitled to any thing, you will get it; if not, I presume you will not wish it. I assure you, so little doubt have I had on this subject, that, had you not been fairly in office, and the reference of the commissioners calling for some delay, as a matter of respect to them, and your being an isolated subject, in a manner completely within the power of our Government—therefore, any act of the Government against an individual might seem authoritative and domineering, perhaps unjust—I should have sent the officer, with a competent power, to have taken peaceable possession of those archives, documents, &c. Any thing which may clearly be your private property shall always be most religiously respected. As it is, I wish you to consider well what course you will take. I do not wish to prejudice your claim; indeed, any thing I can fairly do for you I shall, as the chief executive officer of this province, consider myself bound to do. But I shall deem it useless again to write to you on this matter. As you have not mentioned in yours of the 5th that you laid my letter, as requested, in extenso, before the ex-Governor, Colonel Coppinger, I presume you did not, and it is useless to repeat that request.

Mr. Law, who hands you this, will receive your determination.

Yours, with all proper respect, &c.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,
Sec'y and acting Governor of E. Florida.

Commission to Messrs. Bell, Forbes, and Law.

ST. AUGUSTINE, October 1, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: I do myself the pleasure of appointing you, hereby, to the execution of the following delicate and important commission. You will, without delay, demand and receive from all and every of the subjects of the King of Spain, or other persons who are now here, all the remaining archives and documents which ought to have been transferred to the United States on the cession of this province, and which may be retained under any pretext whatever.

It is supposed that all the papers which shall properly come under your cognizance may be had on application to Colonel Jose Coppinger, late commissioner and Governor of this province, and his secretary, Mr. Aguilar; also, to Mr. Juan de Entralgo, late notary, register, &c.

To put you in full possession of this subject, I enclose you papers marked 1, 2, 3, 4, &c.

It is supposed there will be no refusal to deliver to you all the archives and documents contemplated by this order. Should there be, you are hereby authorized to summon sufficient force to your aid, by calling on the high sheriff, Captain Hanham, with the posse comitatus, or, if absolutely necessary, and in your opinion preferable, by requesting Colonel Eustis to send you a competent detachment from Fort St. Mark's.

You will keep and render a particular account of your proceedings, and I name to you Mr. John Bird and Mr. Anselm Gay as clerks to this commission. You are hereby further empowered to send for persons, papers, and proofs, to ascertain any facts you may deem necessary respecting said archives and documents, and to take declarations and affidavits on oath, as may be proper on this subject—

1. Of the archives and documents which were here at the time of the cession.

2. Those which may have been concealed or sent away.

3. Those which now are delivered over; and all such other and further matters and things touching the present service as in your sound discretion you may see fit.

At the same time, I wish this duty to be performed with promptness and effect; I wish every respect becoming the American character, I trust so truly famed for its sound regard both for public and private rights, and its pure love of justice, to be shown, in particular, to the late officers and subjects of His Catholic Majesty; and it is confiding so fully in your high official and private reputations, that I select you for this trust, and leave its execution so fully to your judgment and discretion.

Captain Bell having been here before and at the cession, and having exercised the functions of acting Governor of this province before my arrival, will be considered as president of this commission; Colonel Forbes, the marshal of the United States for the Floridas, and late commissioner to the Havana to receive those archives and documents, the second named; and Mr. Law, the present alcalde, will receive the archives and documents, agreeably to General Jackson's ordinance on the subject.

The artillery, munitions, and implements, mentioned in the proces verbal of the 10th July last, by Colonels Coppinger and Butler, are to remain as they are; but none of the archives and documents which you shall deem ought to have been delivered over with the province are to be further delayed.

You will, I am confident, be correct, cautious, and decided in the premises.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,

Sec'y and acting Governor of E. F.

J. R. BELL, J. G. FORBES, and E. LAW, Esqs.

Report of the Commissioners.

ST. AUGUSTINE, October 4, 1821.

SIR: The undersigned commissioners, appointed by your letter bearing date the 1st of October, 1821, empowering them to demand of Colonel Jose Coppinger, late commissioner on the part of His Catholic Majesty to deliver the possession of East Florida to the commissioner on the part of the United States, and the archives and documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the province, and to demand of Juan Blas de Entralgo, late notary, a register, &c. of this province, the archives and records in his possession, having executed the commission intrusted to them, beg leave to submit the following report of their proceedings:

That, in pursuance of your instructions, the undersigned proceeded to the office of Don Juan B. de Entralgo, at 4 o'clock of yesterday: having entered, and found the son of Don Entralgo alone in the office, a messenger was despatched for him; on his arrival, a formal demand was made for all the archives and records in his possession, relative to the property and sovereignty of the province. To this demand Don Entralgo replied that the papers were in his possession, and must there remain, until the question respecting them, submitted to the two Governments, should be determined, as agreed upon between Colonel Coppinger and Colonel Butler. And upon the undersigned informing Mr. Entralgo that their instruction was to take immediate possession of the archives and records in his possession, he replied that such an act would be considered by him as forcible, and against his consent. The undersigned then proceeded to take possession of the papers found in his office, excepting such as related to his private concerns, and, having put them in five boxes, requested Mr. Entralgo to put his seal upon them; which offer he declined. The boxes were then deposited in the public store for safe keeping.

In the mean time, one of the undersigned, accompanied by one of the secretaries to this commission and the sheriff of St. John's county, proceeded to the house of Colonel Coppinger, and made a similar demand, and received the same answer as given by Don Entralgo. A request was then made that Colonel Coppinger would be present when the papers in his possession should be taken; and was also requested to affix his seal to the boxes, together with one of the undersigned, there to remain until an examination of the papers should take place: both of which propositions were rejected by him. He continued to protest against all the proceedings of the undersigned, and refused to open the door of his office. The undersigned then proceeded, as the only alternative left them, to force open the door. They then took possession of the papers, amounting to six boxes, boxed them up, and deposited them in the public storehouse for safe keeping. In order to insure the safety of the papers, archives, and records, which the undersigned have taken possession of, a guard has been placed in front of the building in which they are deposited. Before closing this report, the undersigned further state, that letters have been addressed by them to Colonel Coppinger and Don Entralgo, offering to receive any communication that they might think proper to make. The former has informed them that he will make such communication, and the latter has replied that he has none to make.

All the papers will remain in the place where they are at present deposited, until the undersigned receive your instructions relative to them.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. G. FORBES,

Appointment of Secretaries.

ST. AUGUSTINE, October 3, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: I do myself the pleasure to appoint you as secretaries to the commission of the 1st instant, respecting the archives and documents. You will be pleased to attend the commissioners to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, and proceed to act agreeably to their instructions.

In this duty you are selected for your ability and trustworthiness. Yours, respectfully,

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,

Secretary and acting Governor of East Florida.

Judge FARQUHAR BETHUNE,

Messrs. PATRICK LYNCH, and WM. REYNOLDS.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Worthington, Secretary and acting Governor of East Florida, to the Secretary of State, dated

St. AUGUSTINE, December 11, 1821.

I now enclose you the balance of the papers in the case of the archives, &c., as promised in my letter of the 4th instant, marked Nos. 9, 10, and 11.

As I have written officially to yourself and General Jackson on the proceedings had here respecting the archives and documents taken into our possession from the Spanish ex-Governor Colonel Coppinger, and the escribano Mr. Entralgo, it seems to me premature and improper to follow Colonel Coppinger's example, by publishing the correspondence, &c., in the newspapers. However, if it should be deemed necessary and proper, I have not a particle of doubt that our proceedings can be vindicated from every aspersion which he or any one else has attempted to cast on us.

Instructions to Secretaries.

ST. AUGUSTINE, October 4, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: In pursuance of the authority vested in you by the letter of appointment from the acting Governor of East Florida, bearing date the 3d instant, you will proceed to the examination of the papers and documents contained in the boxes deposited in the public store-room. The object of this examination is to separate those papers which clearly relate to the property of individual citizens of this province, or of the late Government thereof, from those which have no relation thereto, but are more properly the property of the late Government exclusively. Under the former description of papers and documents, it is deemed that the following are embraced, viz: The royal or other orders, authorizing the Governors of this province to issue grants to individuals for lands, lots, and squares; the evidence of indemnity offered by Great Britain to her subjects who might leave their property in the province, and retire to her territory after the cession to Spain; the proclamation of the Spanish authorities calling on all those individuals to come and dispose of their property, or peaceably occupy it within certain periods, or the same would be confiscated, and the order of confiscation thereafter; the original records of all grants made in the province, either by His Catholic Majesty, the Captain General of Cuba, or the Governor of this province, respectively; the original records relating to all trials and decisions embracing individual property, and the original records relating to the execution of wills and administration of estates; the records of transfers of property by individuals; the archives of the royal treasury, and of the treasurer of the province; the archives relating to the property or rights of the corporate authority of St. Augustine; and, in general, all papers and documents which clearly relate to and may serve to elucidate the rights of individuals, or of the late Government of Spain, and which are omitted to be here enumerated. You will make an inventory of all these papers, and will, in like manner, make an inventory of such papers as are not embraced within the scope of these instructions, which you will deposite in a separate box or boxes, and mark the same. After having executed the commission with which you

No. 10.

Messrs. Bell and Forbes to Mr. Worthington, Secretary and acting Governor of East Florida.

St. AUGUSTINE, Nov. 5, 1821.

SIR: The undersigned commissioners, under your letter of appointment, dated the 1st of October, 1821, to take into possession the records and archives then in the hands of Colonel Coppinger and Don Juan B. de Entralgo, late Spanish Governor and escribano, in addition to the partial report of their proceedings, beg leave to submit the following, as a final report of their official conduct, and of the secretaries under them, appointed for the examination and separation of the said archives and records.

On the 5th of October, 1821, Farquhar Bethune, William Reynolds, and Patrick Lynch, Esqrs., the secretaries alluded to above, attended, and were sworn faithfully to discharge the duties of their office. The tenor of the oath, and the other subsequent proceedings thereon, your Excellency will find recorded in a book used for that purpose, and which accompanies this communication.

The undersigned continued to meet from day to day, for the completion of their commission, until the 23d of October, 1821, when the commission would have adjourned, having been informed by the secretaries that they had finished the examination, and would report thereon as soon as practicable; but a more ample examination of box No. 3 having been deemed expedient, the undersigned attended with the secretaries until the same was examined.

The undersigned have this day received from the secretaries above named a report of their proceedings, accompanied by registers, marked Nos. 2 and 3; which report and registers will be submitted to your Excellency's inspection. By which report it appears that said secretaries have discharged the commission with which they were intrusted; and the register will show your Excellency what papers are retained as coming within the purview of your instructions, as also those papers that are to be returned to the Spanish Government.

J. G. FORBES.

Secretary, &c.

No. 11.

Mr. Worthington to the Commissioners.

St. AUGUSTINE, Nov. 7, 1821.

GENTLEMEN: I had the honor to receive your additional report of the 5th instant, on yesterday evening, on the subject of the records and archives; and I felicitate you on your conclusion of the difficult and laborious duties which it was deemed necessary to assign to you, which you so cheerfully undertook, and so faithfully have discharged. I have been an eyewitness of the open and assiduous manner in which you conducted the investigation; and I have no doubt, when the voluminous mass which you have transmitted shall be criticised, it will prove to be an honest and able examination.

Without detracting from the other commissioners, I must be permitted to pay a particular compliment to the president, who, during the whole tedious inquiry, while the epidemic raged in the city, with the utmost punctuality presided at the board. I know the various duties of Colonel Forbes, and the sickness of Mr. Law, prevented them giving such full attendance as they otherwise would have done. I am perfectly satisfied with them and the whole board. You will be pleased to present my respects to the secretaries, Messrs. Bethune, Gay, Lynch, and Reynolds, for the faithful discharge of their duties.

And now, gentlemen, I must be permitted to say, notwithstanding the clamor which has been raised, on a similar proceeding, respecting the archives at Pensacola, and even against the affair here, that you have conducted and finished this commission in a manner to challenge the approbation of every disinterested and honest American in this country, and I hope even of every unprejudiced Spaniard, who possesses one spark of true Castilian honor and sincerity. With great respect, &c.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,
Sec'y and acting Gov. of East Florida.

To JOHN R. BELL, J. G. FORBES,

Letter from G. Walton, Secretary of West Florida, to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, October 29, 1821.

SIR: Presuming that the President would be desirous to be informed of the state of affairs in this province, I have thought it advisable to communicate with the Department direct, not having yet heard of the arrival of the Governor at Nashville, for which place he set out on the 8th instant.

The Department is already fully informed of the disposition made by General Jackson previous to his departure. He was pleased to delegate to me the powers exercised by the former Governor of West Florida, accompanying my commission with a letter of instructions. Since his departure I have been in the exercise of those functions, and shall use my best exertions to justify the confidence of the President and the expectations of General Jackson.

Nothing suggests itself, at present, of sufficient importance to communicate. All things go on well, and the march of the Government is peaceable and undisturbed.

The excitement occasioned by measures deemed necessary by the Governor is subsiding, and, since the departure of the Spanish officers, there seems to be a much greater disposition on the part of the Spanish inhabitants to cultivate a friendly feeling. Nothing has been heard of General Jackson since he left Claiborne. By this time I think it probable that he has reached the State of Tennessee.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEO. WALTON,

Sec'y and acting Gov. of West Florida.

J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, Dec. 22, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose, for the information of the committee, agreeably to the request contained in your letter of the 11th instant, the papers, of which a list is subjoined; to which will be added copies of other papers upon the same subject, (the establishment of a government over the Floridas,) as soon as they can be prepared.

I am, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

JOHN SERGEANT, Esq.,

Chairman Jud. Com., H. R.

General Jackson to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, July 30, 1821.

SIR: I seize the first moment of leisure I have been able to obtain for more than a month to lay before you an account of the commission confided to me in relation to the Floridas, and also the measures adopted for their government until the will of the President be known.

In my letters from Blakely, of the 1st and 7th of May, (duplicates of which, with accompanying documents, have been forwarded,) I informed you of my arrival at that place; of my disappointment in not hearing from the Hornet; of my despatching Messrs. Brackenridge and Bronaugh with a letter to Governor Callava; and of my communication with Montpelier. I had with confidence calculated on the arrival of the Hornet by the 1st of May; and, from a knowledge of the habitual apathy of Spanish functionaries, I thought it advisable, even before the arrival of the Hornet, to announce my commission to the Spanish Governor of West Florida, and, after offering to exhibit the royal order and my commission for receiving the country, to ask information upon certain points which would tend to expedite and facilitate subsequent arrangements. From this letter (which has also been forwarded) it will be seen that he declined to comply with my request; but I am well satisfied that this early step had a favorable operation upon our subsequent transactions. It drew from him a promise that the surrender of the country should not be delayed by him, in case he should be the person commissioned for the purpose; and I think it not improbable that this measure had also some effect with the Captain General of Cuba. I had received intimation, both at New Orleans and at Blakely, that speculations were in contemplation, to accomplish which great pains would be taken by the parties concerned to delay the surrender of the ceded country; and, since that period, I have heard it frequently expressed as a matter of surprise that no attempt of the kind had been made, at least in this question.

On the return of Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge, I proceeded to Montpelier, having been previously joined by my aid-de-camp, Captain Call. On the 11th I again addressed a letter to the Governor of West Florida, which I despatched by Captain Call, who was instructed to remain at Pensacola until the arrival of the Hornet, (for I still confidently hoped this could not be delayed many days;) and also authorized Captain Call to make any preliminary arrangements with the Governor, which he would be willing to enter into. In my letter to him of the 11th, after expressing my regret at his not considering himself authorized to give the information I had asked, I informed him that orders had been given to provide transportation for six hundred men, with supplies for their voyage; that the same was then ready, and would sail for Pensacola on the first notification of the receipt of the royal order at that place. In doing this, my intention was to deprive him of all excuse on the score of his not having had sufficient time to make his preparations for quitting the country. I had previously informed him of the assurances of the Spanish Minister at Washington that no delay should be experienced in the surrender of the Floridas, and which I now took occasion to repeat. After stating the unpleasant situation in which the American troops were placed in the interior, I proceeded to inform him that two public vessels, the Shields and the Amelia, were then at anchor in Mobile bay, with supplies for Pensacola and St. Mark's, and proposed to make a deposite of the supplies intended for our troops at the former place; and also requested to be informed whether it would meet his wishes to have the troops of Spain brought from St. Mark's to Pensacola, as a preparatory measure to the surrender of the country, so that all the Spanish officers and soldiers might sail together under the same convoy. This was intended to render the evacuation more convenient and agreeable to them. I had begun to entertain serious doubts of the speedy arrival of the Hornet, and thought that, if a preliminary arrangement of this kind could be made, time might be saved. The Governor, in his reply of the 16th, consented to the proposal of making a deposite of the provisions for the American troops, approved of the proposal respecting the transportation of the troops from St. Mark's, but denied that he had any power to make any preliminary arrangement, or do any act connected with the surrender of the country, until he should have received orders from his superiors. The vessel accordingly sailed for Pensacola, and the provisions were placed in deposite at that place. It may be well here to observe, that, at a subsequent period, the Governor thought proper to claim the benefit of the proposal to bring the Spanish troops to this place from St. Mark's, although not assented to when made, and which was acceded to by me from a wish to deal with him in the most liberal and generous manner, at the same time that I was determined to permit no idle and useless delay.

Nearly two weeks had elapsed after the departure of Captain Call without hearing a word of the Hornet. The anxiety which I experienced can be more readily imagined than expressed. Without speaking of my own situation, and that of my family, which are extremely uncomfortable, I began to entertain serious apprehensions that there was no intention to surrender the country before the 23d of August. During this painful state of suspense, many rumors were afloat, and how far well or ill founded it was impossible for me to say. I was utterly unable to conjecture the cause of the delay of Colonel Forbes; it appeared to me that a few days would have sufficed for the transmission of the royal order to the Floridas; and I took it for granted that if any considerable delay was likely to be experienced in procuring the archives, a person could be left to receive them, in order to accomplish the more important object of obtaining immediate possession of the ceded territories. On an attentive examination of the stipulations of the treaty, I was satisfied, in my own mind, that the seventh article, relating to the transportation of the Spanish officers and troops, and the evacuation of the places occupied by them, was a different matter from the surrender of the sovereignty of the country, as stipulated under the second article of the treaty, and for which no specific time was appointed, and therefore to date from the exchange of ratifications. This construction was confirmed by the stipulations on the subject of duties, by which the twelve years privilege granted to Spain was to commence three months after the ratification, and the provision (which, under a construction different from that I have given, would have been entirely unnecessary) that the duties collected by the Spanish custom-house officers, from the time of the exchange of ratifications until the surrender, might be retained. The circumstances attending the treaty, although not appearing on the face of it, I was satisfied ought, in good conscience and in truth, to place the date of its ratification on the part of Spain as far back as October last. These were considerations which I kept in reserve, to be acted on only in case of the most urgent necessity, having set out with a determination to carry the treaty into effect, if possible, in harmony and good will. I was also determined, on the arrival of the royal order, to permit no useless delay, as I conceived that after this the termination of the business was left to Colonel Callava and myself, (our respective Governments having confided it to us,) and I was determined that, on such event, nothing should be wanting on my part.

On the 20th Captain Call returned to Montpelier in company with Mr. Thompson, who brought me the first certain information of the Hornet. Mr. Thompson was the bearer of a letter from Colonel Forbes, (to which I refer you,) which, although far from being satisfactory, together with the assurances of Mr. Thompson that the Hornet would probably have sailed in a few days after his departure from Havana, served in some measure to remove the uneasiness I had experienced. I began to entertain a hope that the long expected vessel might at last arrive. In anticipation of this event I addressed a letter to Colonel Gadsden, who had shortly before reached Pensacola, and appointed him a confidential agent to reside at that place, and for the purposes expressed in my letter to him of the 21st of May, to which I refer you. Having occasion for the services of Colonel Gadsden near me, I transferred his powers to Captain Call, and was joined by the former at Montpelier. On the 22d I addressed a letter to Major Fanning, the officer commanding at Fort Gadsden, giving the necessary orders for the taking possession and occupation of St. Mark's; to which I must also refer you, as more fully explanatory of the arrangements made with a view to that operation.

From this period until I addressed you my letter of the 30th of May, I remained at Montpelier, in the same uncertainty, and with unceasing solicitude. Reports reached me that Captain Read of the Hornet had fallen a victim to the climate of Havana, and that the greater part of the crew were unfit for duty. My letter of the 9th of June will show the painful anxiety which I felt during this period, not a little heightened by the bad state of my health. I prepared, in the mean time, an express, to be despatched to St. Augustine, with instructions to Colonel Butler, and wrote him the letter under date of the 2d of June, to give him the earliest information of events in this quarter. I was apprehensive that the vessels employed to transport the troops from East Florida would have arrived, and occasioned a heavy demurrage, as the same precautions could not well be taken there as in this quarter, where we were more convenient to the place at which the transports were to be procured.

I had almost given up all hope of the arrival of the Hornet, when, at last, I was informed by express that she had arrived at Pensacola on the evening of the 9th of June, after having been detained six weeks in Havana for reasons which to me still remain unaccounted for. A letter from Colonel Forbes was brought by the same express, informing me of his arrival at Pensacola, in company with Don Alba, a commissioner on the part of Spain. I refer you to this letter, and to my reply, dated the 11th. I could not but remark with some surprise that the order of the Captain General was for the delivery of West Florida to Colonel Forbes, as commissioner on the part of the United States; this was owing to a mistake, Colonel Forbes informs me, which, although discovered before the sailing of the Hornet, could not be corrected for the want of time. The length of time which elapsed from the date of the order and the sailing of the Hornet is a circumstance which, I must confess, I do not clearly understand. It is by no means accounted for by the delay in procuring the archives; all that could be procured were a few extracts from the treaty of 1783, between Spain and Great Britain, and which, I presume, is to be had in any common library. The important papers relating to the grants of land in this country, as well as other documents directly relating to the Floridas, must still be the subject of negotiation between the respective Governments. I forbear to make any further remark on this head; but will refer you to my letter of the 11th, sent by express after my former letter had gone, and also to the communications of Colonel Forbes himself.

Without loss of time, I addressed the letter of the 12th to Governor Callava, having previously received his communication of the 10th, brought to me by Captain Call. I expressed my gratification at the promptitude with which he had imparted to me the information he had promised on the arrival of the Hornet, and was pleased with his frankness in waiving any advantage of the order being for the surrender of the country to Mr. Forbes. To meet what appeared liberal with equal liberality, I assented to his request that the Spanish troops should be brought from St. Mark's, to be embarked with those at this place. Captain Call, who had been authorized to make the arrangement for the evacuation of St. Mark's, had been met by the difficulty anticipated by you in relation to the construction of the treaty. The Spanish Governor required a receipt for the cannon and munitions of war left at St. Mark's, contending that the former were not included under the term "fortification." To this proposal I acceded, according to the terms expressed in my letter of the 12th, in which I urged all the arguments which then suggested themselves to me, to prove the right of the United States under the second article of the treaty. I also brought into view the manner in which the seventh article was expressed, and the liberal construction placed upon it by the President, under a belief that a construction equally liberal would be placed by Spain on the one before mentioned; and finally referred him to Captain Call, to whom I had given, in my letter of the same date, authority to make a provisional arrangement, in case the Governor, after the reasons I had given, should persist in his construction of the treaty: this was, to receipt for the cannon on the forts, on condition that receipts should also be given for the transportation furnished for civil officers, servants, &c., and provisions, not provided for by the express letter of the seventh article; giving it, at the same time, to be distinctly understood, that the United States should, by no act of mine, be considered as abandoning their right to the cannon as part of the appendages of the forts. An inventory of the munitions of war embraced in their claim was to be taken, and the receipt to specify that they had been received with the forts, but claimed by the Spanish commissioner as not included in the cession, and to be held by the American agents, subject to any future disposition which might be made by the respective Governments; the Spanish commissioner to receipt for provisions, transportation of families of officers, civil officers, &c., in the same form; and the Governor was distinctly informed that, in case the Spanish Government insisted upon the delivery of the one, the United States would insist upon payment for the other. Captain Call was also instructed, in case this proposed arrangement should not prove satisfactory, to refuse transportation for every thing not literally included in the seventh article of the treaty; and at the same time to protest against the dismantling the forts, as an act on the Governor's own responsibility, and as a violation of the second article of the treaty. As an evidence of my desire to settle the business in the most satisfactory and amicable manner, Captain Call was instructed to comply with the Governor's request for transportation of two field-pieces from St. Mark's, and some ordnance stores. In the same letter, I informed the Governor of my intention to move in a few days into the vicinity of Pensacola. I also gave him to understand that the transports deemed necessary had been provided, and might shortly be expected in Pensacola.

On the 16th of June, after an unpleasant journey, on account of the unusual rains which had prevailed for a considerable time, I arrived at the house of Manuel Gonzales, distant fifteen miles from Pensacola, where I intended to await the arrival of the troops, and to remain until I had officially announced to the Governor my entrance into the Floridas for the purpose of receiving possession, as commissioner on the part of the United States. On the day of my arrival at Manuel's, I wrote to the Governor, by Colonel Gadsden, informing him of my arrival at that place, prepared to accomplish the object of my commission. I expressed a wish that a period as early as possible might be concluded on, to our mutual convenience, when we might meet, exhibit our credentials, officially recognise each other, and enter on the duties of our respective commissions. I stated that Colonel Gadsden was authorized by me to take charge of any communications from him, and to concert the arrangements connected with the proposition made. On the same evening I received a long letter, dated on that day, from the Governor, in answer to mine on the subject of the construction of the treaty, with a few lines on the envelope, informing me that, but for his ill state of health, he would have done himself the pleasure of waiting on me in person. My reply, dated the 17th, contains a brief refutation of his reasoning, and an expression of my unwillingness to induce him to depart from the positive instructions which he informed me he had received. I concluded by observing that, when I should have the pleasure of seeing him personally, I should hope to make an arrangement agreeably to the instructions given to Captain Call, and which he had communicated to him, and which will refer the subject of difference to be adjusted by our respective Governments.

The situation of the troops, now encamped near Manuel's, was inconvenient, on account of the distance from their supplies. There were many reasons strongly requiring that the American flag should be hoisted in Pensacola without delay; American vessels were arriving, and were expected to arrive, which had sailed from ports of the United States under the faith of the expected surrender, and which would be exposed to the payment of heavy duties, through the means of an arbitrary valuation; there had been a great increase of American population, and which was augmenting every day; and the state of things incident to a country so nearly on the point of being transferred forever to the dominion of another nation may be readily conceived; added to all this the neglect of the police, which I was informed existed in Pensacola, and attention to which is so important to a place that must be indebted to this circumstance, perhaps, more than to any other, for its future growth. Under all these circumstances, I authorized Colonel Gadsden to make the proposition mentioned in his letter of the 18th, in the hope that it might possibly meet the approbation of Governor Callava, but without intending to insist upon it. From the other part of Colonel Gadsden's letter, it will be seen that it was my wish that a time and place might be designated at which we might meet, recognise each other, and enter on the business of our respective commissions. A misapprehension occurred on this subject, which was not explained until the close of our correspondence. Not receiving such a communication as I thought I had a right to expect, and not being visited by the Governor, or any of his officers, I concluded to remain with my family where I was; and, as the Governor had officially recognised me as commissioner, I resolved to carry on the preparatory negotiation by means of my staff.

I received another letter from the Governor on the 19th, together with his letter to Colonel Gadsden. I refer you to my letter of the day following, in which I enter into a full and explicit statement of what I conceived to have been misunderstood. In the course of that communication, after enumerating some of the more urgent reasons on my part for obtaining a speedy delivery of West Florida, I requested him to state in how many days after the arrival of the troops from St. Mark's he would be prepared to evacuate the Floridas. I mentioned the circumstance of one of the transports, the Anna Maria, having arrived some time before; the Cora having, unfortunately, been cast away near the Balize, but that prompt measures had been taken to remedy the misfortune. In the same communication I informed the Governor of the appointment of Major Stanton to discharge the duties attendant on the transportation of the Spanish troops, and to concert the necessary measures for their comfort. In the concluding observations of my letter, I regretted the existing difference respecting the construction of any articles of the treaty, the stipulations of which we were, in part, commissioned to execute. I received on the 22d the Governor's letter of that date, together with the one of the 20th, enclosing several propositions relating to preliminary arrangements for the surrender of the country and the fortifications of Barancas. In the letter of the 22d, he informed me that Don Alba was merely the bearer of despatches from the Captain General, and clothed with no official character in relation to the Floridas, and declared himself to be commissioner. He waived the exhibition of my commission for the present, but requested an attested copy; which was accordingly sent. In reply to my request of appointing a day, after the arrival of the troops from St. Mark's for the delivery of West Florida, he stated that, as soon as the garrison of Appalache should reach Pensacola, and the transports should be ready, he considered four, or six days at the utmost, as sufficient for the delivery of it, and the embarkation of the equipage, troops, and other individuals; whence he declared that I might now consider the time solicited by me to be fixed. The subject of the artillery was again touched upon in his letter, when I had flattered myself with a hope that it had been well understood and settled. The artillery and its appendages, he informed me, could not be submitted to any kind of compromise; such, at least, was the meaning given to the Spanish expressions—no puedo sugirarlo a ninguna cosa de compromiso. Not a little surprised at what appeared to me little short of equivocation, on the receipt of it I experienced no small degree of mortification. I called upon Captain Call for his report whether he had not communicated to Governor Callava my instructions given him in relation to this subject; and, immediately upon receiving his report, (to which I beg to refer you,) I addressed to Governor Callava my communication of the 23d, in which I deemed it necessary to recapitulate what I had said on the subject of the construction of the second and seventh articles of the treaty; and in order to prevent any future misunderstanding, I reduced the subject to these two distinct propositions:

1st. That an inventory of the cannon, munitions of war, &c., belonging to the fortifications ceded, should be taken, and signed by the proper officers authorized to do so, with a remark that said cannon, ordnance, &c., were claimed by him, but left in my possession, subject to any future dispositions which might be made of them by our respective Governments.

2d. That an inventory of the transportation of families of officers and servants, and provisions placed on board of the transports for the supply of the troops on their voyage, should be made out and certified by him as furnished by me.

I observed that these were the propositions to which I had supposed he had assented, and that they corresponded with the instructions given to Captain Call. I had now hoped the subject was understood and at rest. In the Governor's reply of the 25th, he acknowledges himself to be well acquainted with the tenor of the particulars which it embraces, and particularly with that part which relates to the artillery; he declares that no mistake could have occurred in the account given by him to the Minister of His Catholic Majesty at Washington; and in the concluding part of his letter he observes, that no objection or remark offers itself to giving me a certificate setting forth the number of persons transported, and of the provisions supplied them for their voyage.

A short correspondence, to which I refer you, had, at the same time, taken place respecting the transmission to St. Augustine of the necessary orders for the delivery of that place. I refer you, also, to my letter to Colonel Forbes, and his reply. The length to which this communication has already been unavoidably drawn out precludes me from making any remark at present on this business. This circumstance, however added to the necessity of despatching Colonel Gadsden to St. Augustine; and preparatory to this, I prepared the letter to Colonel Butler, the commission to Mr. Worthington, and letter to that gentleman, with other documents referred to, and of which I gave an account in my letter to you of the 29th of June. In that letter you will perceive my understanding respecting the provisional arrangement, on the subject of the disputed articles of the treaty, clearly and fully expressed. I refer you to the correspondence between the Governor and myself previous to that date, and after the 25th. This tedious length of correspondence in settling so many matters of detail, as well as of greater importance, was what I had not expected, and, in the then state of my health, was extremely fatiguing. In my letter of the 26th, I expressed my satisfaction that we had not misunderstood each other on the subject of the artillery, &c. &c. By good fortune, when much at a loss for a mode of conveyance for Colonel Gadsden, the extraordinary rains having rendered the passage across the country almost impracticable, the United States schooner "Revenge" entered this port, and was instantly put in requisition for the service above mentioned. Mr. Forbes and Don Alba, or, rather, the Governor in his behalf, solicited a passage; but, on being informed that the vessel was extremely small, having but one berth, which the commander had given up to Colonel Gadsden, I could not consent. Colonel Forbes, however, embarked without my consent, knowledge, or approbation.

I refer you to my letter of the 1st of July for several preliminary arrangements proposed and acceded to respecting the preparation of the procès verbal; the ceremony to be observed in changing the flag; and the appointment of Messrs. Call, Bronaugh, and Brackenridge, to unite with the like number of persons to be appointed by the Governor, to examine and compare the inventories of archives and public buildings and property. Major Stanton had been appointed for the same service in relation to the artillery, and the taking of the inventory and receipt for the provisions and transportation of civil officers, &c.

By letter of the 3d of July, I communicated to the Governor the arrival of the ship "Lucy Ann," chartered in the room of the "Cora." I intimated that I hoped no delay would occur, on the arrival of the vessel from St. Mark's, of the embarkation of the Spanish troops, &c., on board the transports then ready, and the surrender of the country; that the vessels were under a heavy demurrage; and that I relied on his pledge that no unnecessary delay would be permitted on the arrival of the transports. The accident of the loss of the Cora, and the unusual detention of the vessels from St. Mark's, by contrary winds had already given the Governor much longer time than he could possibly have calculated on when he gave me the pledge already mentioned. Every day which now passed was so much gained on the other side, and a heavy expense to the United States. Instead of three or four days, the usual voyage from St. Mark's to this place, the vessels were detained by adverse winds thirteen days, and at length arrived at Pensacola on the morning of the 9th of July. This event I communicated without loss of time to the Governor, by my letter of the 9th, and requested him to appoint a day for the delivery of West Florida, with the fortress of St. Mark, according to the agreement previously entered into between us. I had been unremitting in my endeavors, as I think will fully appear by the correspondence, to leave nothing unsettled on the arrival of the vessels from St. Mark's, so as to permit no possible excuse for delay; as the Hornet had been here a month already, owing to the unlooked-for loss of the Cora, and the extraordinary prevalence of westerly winds, which prevented the arrival of the vessels just mentioned. For my correspondence with Major Fanning, I also refer to the accompanying documents. I also send you a copy of the order issued by me to Colonel Brooke, preparatory to the march of the troops to Galvez spring. My intention of moving to some convenient spot near Pensacola, immediately before taking possession of West Florida, had already been intimated to the Governor, and assented to. In answer to my request, the Governor, in his letter of the 10th, informed me that on the day following he would name a day, in conformity with his pledge. But on the day following, to my astonishment, he informed me, by his letter of the 11th, that on Saturday the 14th he would inform me whether the surrender should be made on the Monday or Tuesday following—both of these days being beyond the latest period fixed upon for the delivery. I confess I could not but feel considerable irritation; for it seemed to me, that if I permitted him to disregard his pledge at will in one particular, there was no knowing what was next to follow. I was disappointed in what I had confidently expected, and, under these feelings, addressed him my letter of the 12th of July. The troops had marched the day before to Galvez spring, and were on that day joined by me at that place. To the Governor's letter of the 13th, and my reply of the same date, I must beg leave to refer you. I sincerely regretted the unpleasant feeling occasioned by the circumstance I have detailed; but I acted under a sense of duty and a firm conviction of the necessity of the course pursued. The Governor fixed on the 17th as the day for the delivery, unequivocally, and without reserve; and in my letter of that date I advised you of my having obtained possession of West Florida.

I had reposed in the utmost confidence, after the friendly and satisfactory manner in which the delivery was made on the 17th, that the business was finally closed in the way I could have desired. But in this, I regret to say, I have been disappointed. On the day just mentioned, all papers, inventories, &c., were duly prepared for signature on either side, excepting the inventory and receipt for provisions, &c., not expressly stipulated for under the seventh article of the treaty. On the morning of the 17th Major Stanton informed me that he had been waited on by Mr. Cruzat, the Governor's secretary, who, on the part of the Governor, stated that, from ill health and press of business, he was not able to attend to the inventory at that time, and requested that it might be deferred, pledging himself that it should be made out in conformity with the agreement, and satisfactory to me. When this request was reported to me, I confess I was not a little surprised; and, in spite of the high opinion which my officers entertained of Governor Callava, and my own sincere wish to cherish the same opinion, the recollection of the conduct we have on so many occasions experienced from Spanish functionaries, and particularly the conduct of Governor Folk towards Messrs. Ellicot and Hawkins, rendered it impossible for me entirely to divest my mind of distrust. I had constantly cautioned those under my orders to be on their guard; and, on this occasion, I observed to Major Stanton, (who, it will be seen by the accompanying documents, had been fully instructed on the subject,) that if he could place confidence in the promises of the Governor and his secretary, I had no objection to the indulgence. After the Governor was restored to better health, and walking about the town, I urged Major Stanton to obtain the inventory and receipt, in order that I might close my communication to the Government. After a delay of some days, a receipt was presented to me, which, on being translated, I found, with indignation, to be a simple acknowledgment that the transportation and provisions had been furnished by the United States, in compliance with the stipulations of the seventh article of the treaty. I immediately informed Major Stanton that such a thing could not be received, and ordered him to call on Mr. Cruzat, and procure the kind of receipt agreed upon in our correspondence, and which he had pledged himself should be given. After a lapse of ten days, the note to Major Stanton from Mr. Cruzat was presented to me, in which I was informed that no other receipt than the one which the Governor chose to offer would be given. I immediately appointed Doctor Bronaugh to wait on Governor Callava, in company with Major Stanton, and demand a receipt in strict and literal conformity with my letter of the 23d of June, and assented to in his letter of the 25th. I refer you to the report of those gentlemen, by which it will be seen that he utterly refused. I then addressed him my letter of the 3d of August, declaring, in the most explicit manner, that, in consequence of his faithless conduct, the receipt given by me for the artillery is null and void, and that I should so report it to my Government—the execution of the one being the consideration of the other. The conduct of Governor Callava has mortified me exceedingly, especially as I had wished to think well of him, and as he had been uniformly represented to me as a frank, honorable soldier. I cannot but view his refusal, under the circumstances detailed, as a most base and flagrant breach of faith. To prove that there could be no misunderstanding on the score of translation, I beg leave to refer you to the certificate of Messrs. Brackenridge and Rutledge.

I now proceed to lay before you the measures adopted by me for the government of East and West Florida in the best manner possible for the present. In this province, the Government, like every thing else, was in a state of dismemberment and neglect. The circumstance of its being on the eve of a transfer to the United States, occasioned a total indifference and carelessness in the administration of all its branches. For a more minute account, I refer you to the report of Judge Brackenridge, and to the ordinances herewith sent. According to the Spanish scheme of municipal administration, there ought to have been an alcalde, a juge de partido, a fiscal, a cabildo, or corporation, and alguazils, or sheriffs, and constables. At Pensacola, none of these offices were filled, except that of the alcalde, who was the only civil provincial officer, properly speaking, in West Florida. To limp along in this maimed and imperfect state, seemed to me intolerable. On consultation with an eminent lawyer from Orleans, who was present at the change of government there, and also with Judge Brackenridge, a gentleman of high legal acquirements, who was in Louisiana some time after, I resolved, without going as far as I understood the Governor of that province had gone, to fill up those offices which I found vacant, and to make such alterations as seemed to me absolutely called for by the mere circumstance of the cessation of the Government of Spain, and the extension of that of the United States over the country. The first ordinance establishes the corporation, to which this place under the Spanish constitution is entitled. The great accession of population, and the neglect of the police for the last two years, called for a body exclusively intrusted with its superintendence. Their powers conform to those which they would have possessed under the Spanish Government. The taxes which they are authorized to lay are such as have been usually paid. The board of health was peculiarly necessary, from the vital importance to this place to preserve its character for salubrity. The ordinance relating to the registering the names of those who may be desirous of claiming the benefit of the sixth article of the treaty was dictated, first, by the necessity of affording some evidence which could be used by those who were at once disposed to make their election and become citizens of the United States, and without which they would still be regarded as foreigners; and, secondly, by the impropriety, of which I had no little experience in Louisiana, of persons claiming exemption as foreigners, and the privileges of citizens, as it suited their convenience. The establishment of a county court, by adding four justices of the peace to the presiding judge, was with a view to the police of the county, as that of the city was intrusted to the corporation, and also for the trial of offences against the public peace and happiness. The presentments and trial by jury are both in the contemplation of the Spanish constitution, as well as that of the United States. The ordinance regulating the proceedings of the court in civil cases rather makes known the Spanish procedure than establishes any thing new to the Spanish law, excepting the pronouncing final judgment in public on set days, and requiring the witnesses to give evidence viva voce, when their attendance can be procured. The appointment of justices of the peace was so necessary a measure, particularly in the remote settlements, which are rapidly increasing, that it seems scarcely necessary to say any thing on the subject. It must be recollected that much the greater part of the population of this country are Americans; that the active commerce is carried on by Americans; and hence the necessity of assimilating the present institutions to something which they can understand, and of administering the laws by means of tribunals not altogether foreign to their habits and feelings. The distance from the Seat of Government is a great inconvenience, as months must elapse before any suggested alterations can be approved and put in operation. I believe the alterations which I have made, unimportant as they are, strictly conform to my instructions, and are certainly indispensable, unless all civil government should be suspended for the present. Colonel Butler informs me that the municipal organization was more complete at St. Augustine; that, besides the alcalde, there were a judge and a cabildo, or corporation: but little change will therefore be necessary in that quarter. The commission under which I act does not define my powers; and, I assure you, I am not a little at a loss when left to collect them from the nature of the office. Judging from the practice in Spanish colonies, the Viceroy, or Captain General, possesses legislative as well as executive powers over the provinces placed under his government. O'Reilly, in Louisiana, of his own authority, introduced the Spanish law, and established tribunals exactly modelled after those of Spain. But, according to the decrees passed under the constitution, those officers are strictly confined to the exercise of military and executive or political power; and the Intendants are exclusively intrusted with the superintendence of the revenue and public property: the former is excepted by the act of Congress. In this uncertainty, I have contented myself with merely organizing a Government from the materials at hand, with as little change, as possible; promulgating the same by way of ordinance, in order that the people may have some knowledge of the system to which they must conform. These ordinances I now transmit for the approval of the President.

From the report of Judge Brackenridge, it will be seen that the only public documents or archives delivered over are those which, in the first place, belong to the notarial office, consisting of transfers of land from individuals, powers of attorney, protests, wills, and other acts, which in Spanish countries appertain to the duties of notary. An inventory of the unbound books containing these acts is transmitted, giving the year and number of pages of each book. In pursuance of my directions, they were marked by Messrs. Call, Bronaugh, and Brackenridge, (who were appointed to compare them with the inventory,) with a letter of the alphabet, and signed, in order that they may be identified. In the second place, the archives of the alcalde's office, and which consist of the papers in suits, from the year 1781 down to the present time, and are very voluminous; but many of them, it is supposed, have been withdrawn or sent to Havana; and as there is no docket or book containing a record of these papers, being considered themselves as the records, it is extremely difficult to detect any fraud with respect to them. There are no original grants, surveys, maps, or even a plat of the city. It is well known that all these papers are at Havana, in the possession of the late Surveyor General Pintado, in whose transcripts of title-papers I do not think any reliance ought to be placed. Having the archives in his possession, he gives authenticated copies, and states himself, in these certificates, to be duly authorized to do so. From this shop it is probable that a number of such titles were transmitted to this country by the Hornet. I am confident that very extensive frauds have been attempted; this opinion is daily strengthened by observation, and I think it highly important that persons of integrity and intelligence should be appointed to sift them. The failure to obtain the archives at Havana will be seriously felt by the honest inhabitants of the country, and will call for more than usual vigilance and attention on the part of the Government to prevent frauds in antedated titles. The conduct of the Captain General in relation to the archives but too well confirms the opinion which I entertained of Spanish functionaries—at least so far as we have had any thing to do with them.

The report of Major Stanton, and the inventory of artillery, &c., receipted for, will show the value of those articles. Every thing, however worthless, has been brought forward, in order to swell that inventory to an imposing magnitude. I am well satisfied that, with the exception of two brass pieces at the Barancas, and two mortars and three howitzers, the cannon left with us is scarcely worth possessing. The artillery at St. Mark's is literally worthless; and I am of opinion that the value of the whole does not much exceed that of the extra transportation and the provisions which have been furnished, and not expressly stipulated for by the treaty. Major Stanton's report will also show the condition of the public buildings. The Government-house is in a ruinous state. I intended, at first, to occupy it myself; but, on examination, it was considered unsafe. It is a frame building, no way remarkable for its structure, and at present entirely out of repair, and in some parts rudely propped with unhewn timber. It has been taken by the officers for quarters, by which there has been a considerable saving to the Government. The block-houses were the most filthy and disgusting places imaginable; but, with some pains, they have been fitted up in such a manner as to afford quarters for the troops. The hospital, which is but a very ordinary building, was in a condition equally disgusting, but has been rendered fit for use by the exertions of the officers. The prison is in a tolerable state of repair, but is a very poor building; all the rest are uninhabitable. The barracks are said to have cost the British Government a large sum of money. The frame is still sound; the basement story is of brick; but the doors and windows have been torn off; the roof is decayed, and, in part, fallen in. Unless something be done in the course of a few months, it will be necessary to pull it down, as it will become a dangerous nuisance. The expense of repairing it will not be less than from $12,000 to $15,000. Proposals have been made to me by a Major Edwards to repair it at his own expense, on condition that he shall have the use of it for six years. The offer appears to me a very advantageous one to the United States; but, possessing no power to enter into it, I could do nothing more than to forward his proposals for the consideration of the President, with a request that an answer may be given as speedily as possible.

In my appointments to office, I was desirous of giving the preference, where I could, to the old inhabitants of the country. I found that but few were willing to accept any situation, from unwillingness to lose their rights as Spanish subjects; the greater part having been in some way or other connected with the Government, or having private claims which might be prejudiced by doing any act evincing their intention to become American citizens. Besides, it is said that strong inducements are held out by the Spanish Government to those who remove. The former alcalde was a half-pay officer, and, of course, could not be continued. The inhabitants, in general, I have found a sober, orderly, peaceable, and well-meaning people. I entertain a very favorable opinion of all the Spanish population, excepting of such as have been employed by the Government, which seems to have had every where the same corrupting influence over the minds and morals of those engaged in its administration.

I have confined myself, in this communication, to the subject of my commission for receiving the Floridas, and to the mere organization of the Government, reserving for a future and final communication the information which I may possess in relation to the country in general. The arrival of Colonel Butler from St. Augustine, and whose report is transmitted in another communication, has happily enabled me to close the business of my commission. This, I hope, has been done in such a manner as to meet the approbation of my Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Commissioner for receiving the Floridas, &c.

P. S. AUGUST 14, 1821.—The foregoing communication was commenced on the day of its date, but was delayed several days, by inability to close the business of the inventory for the provisions, &c.; and after, by unavoidable causes.

A. J.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

Report of Mr. Brackenridge to Governor Jackson.

PENSACOLA, July 26, 1821.

SIR: Besides the Governor of West Florida, there was but one provincial officer actually in the exercise of any civil functions: this was the alcalde, whose place you have appointed me to supply. The person in the exercise of this office, for reasons not necessary to state, could not be continued. I have taken pains to ascertain the duties of this office, but I assure you that it is with great difficulty I have been able to procure any thing of a certain and definite nature. I cannot speak positively with respect to the duties and powers peculiarly and exclusively belonging to the office, the extent to which its jurisdiction or authority reaches, or the changes or alterations made by the constitution, and decrees passed in pursuance of it. The alcalde here has acted as notary public; as chief of the police, he exercised a criminal jurisdiction, but of what nature I do not exactly know. He was superintendent and inspector of the prisons, and performed the duties of alguazil or sheriff. But, on more particular inquiry, I found that this judicial authority is confined to what is called the conciliación—an attempt at compromise, which the Spanish constitution positively requires before any suit can be instituted; and to cases of liquidated demands, to any amount, where the debt is confessed; and in which cases the alcalde has power to carry the judgment into execution, unless some question of law arise afterwards in the course of the proceedings, when he must stop. In all contested cases, and in all questions of law, the dictum of a judge, juez de letras, is necessary to make a decision. There was formerly a letrado, or auditor de guerra, at this place, for the purpose; but there has been none here for some time past. By the decrees under the constitution, the office of auditor and that of asesor have been abolished, and a legal judge is contemplated, with an appeal to other tribunals. By the same decrees, the Viceroy, Captain General, and ultramarine commandants, are circumscribed to functions of a military and political nature, and the Intendant is confined to the collection and management of the revenue. Whether considered under the old or the new order of things, there existed a material deficiency in the organization of the civil government in this province, and especially in the judicial department. I have been able to procure but little information from my predecessor in office; what he said was summed up by the remark that I had more power than the Governor. In conversation with Colonel Callaya, he informed me that the organization was defective; that he had solicited the appointment of ultramarine sub-delegate, as there was at this time no authority in the province to decide a law-suit; that he had obtained it; but, having some doubt on the score of the constitutionality of exercising civil and military functions, and considering the probability of a speedy transfer of the country, he had not thought it worth while to exercise it.

It is evident that the civil government cannot be administered, without filling up the offices which are vacant, without some modifications which the change of sovereignty and severance from Spain render unavoidable, and without establishing some offices to correspond with those contemplated by the Spanish system, but where exactly the same offices cannot be preserved.

In Spanish towns containing less than a thousand souls, all the civil functions of the place are generally discharged by an alcalde; where the population exceeds that number, the constitution gives a right to a cabildo or corporation, and mayor and aldermen, or corregidores and regidores. As Pensacola was the capital of the province, this circumstance alone entitled her to be considered a city. There formerly was a corporation here, but it has fallen into disuse—for what reason I do not know; but its members were elective, as the office of the alcalde has been since the constitution. To require an election under present circumstances, would be to require an impossibility, and would be the same thing as to say there shall be no civil government; for there is no proper officer to hold an election, and there is no way of ascertaining who would have a right to vote. I should think that the powers which, from accident, or other causes, have centred in the hands of the alcalde, may be distributed to other and such officers as are in the contemplation of the Spanish frame of government, or approximating to them as much as possible. To establish exactly the Spanish tribunals, cannot be done, for the reasons already stated, although I believe that no important deviation will be necessary; nor do I think it important, if the powers be substantially the same, that the name should be scrupulously retained, as, for instance, mayor for corregidor, sheriff for alguazil, and presiding justice for juez de letras. The Spanish constitution contemplates a number of tribunals which I am informed have been established by subsequent decrees, but with which I am not acquainted. There was no regular Spanish lawyer here, although a few of the military officers were acquainted with the routine, and were often employed in the management of causes, which was done by writings signed by the parties. As it is impossible for parties themselves to pursue the tedious routine of a Spanish law-suit, it will be necessary to license attorneys. I have said nothing of the appointment of justices of the peace on the rapidly increasing settlements of the Perdido, Escambia, Conecuh, Yellow Water, Choctawhatchie, and Apalachicola, which, I presume, will be agreed on all hands to be absolutely necessary.

The establishment of a corporation in Pensacola, or rather its restoration, has been productive of the happiest effects. Peace, quietness, and order, have taken the place of continual daily and nightly disturbance and disorder. The military force has been almost dispensed with, and its place supplied by civil officers. Attention to the health and comfort of the city has succeeded the total neglect with which these important considerations were treated for months before the change of sovereignty. For the police of the county, the keeping the roads and bridges in repair, licensing retailers, and for the trial of offences against the public safety and happiness, some tribunal is called for. The population of Pensacola, and of the country in general, has increased with very great rapidity; the Americans in this place already outnumber the Spaniards. It may, perhaps, admit of a question whether the Constitution of the United States does not extend its authority over this country by the mere circumstance of its coming under the American Government, and ceasing to be a dependency of any other Power; and, if so, secures to the American citizen, when arrested for crimes or offences, an open and public trial by jury, to be confronted with his accuser and the witnesses brought to testify against him. I should think, moreover, that the article in the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, if possessed of any meaning, is intended to secure some of these privileges to American citizens. I find no Spanish law which secures them to him, and, according to the existing state of things, there is no tribunal here which has power to try him at all. The power of the alcalde extends no further than to take the examination and the deposition of witnesses, to be sent to Havana for decision; or to conduct the conciliation, which is allowed in minor criminal as well as in civil cases. The only criminal records in my office are huge piles of papers containing every thing the parties chose to bring forward; one of these, which I examined, is a proceeding against a person charged with passing counterfeit notes, but who was never apprehended; the prosecution, however, went on, and his property was seized and sold for the costs. Another is the case of two negro men who killed a white man—one of a party, it is alleged, who attempted to kidnap them. One of the negroes was sold to pay the expense of the investigation, and one of the white men, a person of the name of McReynolds, remained near two years in prison here without a trial, and was let out by the Spanish alcalde on the morning of the delivery of the country. During the time that the temporary government was exercised by the officers of the United States Army, some justices of the peace were appointed; but I find no record of any judicial proceeding during that period. Some cases of considerable importance were decided in a summary manner; but as they could not be regularly followed up, from the want of the proper tribunals and officers, the circumstance has, in several instances, been productive of considerable inconvenience.

There is, properly speaking, no trial known to the Spanish judicial procedure. There is what is called the diligencia, or process; generally a mass of papers consisting of the writings of either party, accompanied by whatever he may think proper to exhibit in the progress of a cause, whether relevant or not, and with ex parte affidavits; so that very often the original points of dispute are lost sight of, and even the original parties. The bulk of these papers naturally increases in proportion to the amount in dispute, and the prospect of obtaining fees. The costs of court alone generally amount to from fifty to five hundred dollars. As no judgment is pronounced in open court, or counsel bound to take notice of such judgment, as well as of decrees and orders made in the course of a suit, these must be notified to the opposite party at very considerable expense. Suits commenced and carried on in this way can, of course, never be transferred to, or be acted on by, American courts, and which will certainly be established before many months. The mass of irrelevant matter, and the ex parte affidavits, will, of course, render it impossible to act on such records. But the mere mode of administering justice through the courts, the time, place, and manner, I should think, for the greater part, perfectly within their own control; at least within the control of the person or persons exercising supreme authority in the province. Every essential right of a party may be as well secured by a public trial and judgment, as by a private one by the judge in his closet; truth may be as well got at by evidence given viva voce, in presence of the parties, as by ex parte affidavits; parties can as well be informed of intermediate orders by their counsel, as by the witnesses of asistencia or a notary public. All these purposes are much more cheaply and simply obtained in Louisiana, by the practice adopted to supply the place of the Spanish, but closely modelled after it, and greatly pruned and simplified. Provided all the usual orders be taken, the form of entering them on record, if in two lines, where thirty are now used, does not seem to me objectionable. I believe that, without the alteration of any thing of importance, besides what has been mentioned, the proper and regular tribunals may be established to administer justice, civil and criminal, and by this means reconcile the difficulty of administering the Government with the existing authorities, and of respecting every right which the citizen of the United States can justly claim as such under the Constitution or treaty with Spain. Another, and a very obvious inconvenience of the present state of things, is, that the powers of the different officers, and the course to be pursued to obtain redress, are unknown to the people. I have endeavored, without success, to procure even the fee-bill. A person has been usually employed to tax the costs, for which he was entitled to two dollars. The jues de letras, according to the Spanish law, regulated his own charge for his order or decree, and, in one case in this office, it amounts to six hundred reals, or one hundred dollars!

The truth is, that, with respect to the nature of the tribunals and civil functionaries which ought to exist here, whether under the old or new order of things, according to the Spanish laws, and the exact mode of procedure in judicial proceedings, it is impossible to obtain any exact and safe information. Whatever the theory may be, the practice here, I believe, depended on the individual in power or office. To carry on the Government under present circumstances is out of the question; for some time past there has been, in fact, no Government; and the change in the state of society requires an immediate organization of some kind or other. What is wanted is a plain and simple mode of proceeding, capable of being understood and made known; a tribunal before which a trial can be had, whether it be constituted of an alcalde, asesor, judge, letrado, or juez de letras.

On the subject of the archives delivered to me by the former alcalde, they consist of unbound books from the year 1781 until the present time, and contain nothing more than the transfers of property from one individual to another, protests, wills, mortgages, and powers of attorney; and which, strictly and properly, under the Spanish laws, belong to the office of notary. Excepting the extract of the treaty of 1783 between Spain and England, there is nothing in the office which belongs to the Department of State: there are not even the original grants made by the Spanish Government to individuals; all which are said to be in the Havana. These papers are, however, highly important to the inhabitants of the country; and, in order that they might be completely identified, over and above the inventory of the books furnished by the Spanish officers, Captain Call, Dr. Bronaugh, and myself, in pursuance of your instructions, numbered and lettered them, placing our signatures on each book, and making an inventory in this form, which remains in the office as a part of the records. The other papers delivered to me are, the processes or diligencias of lawsuits; which are also important to the inhabitants of the country, but not to the Government of the United States.

I am, with great respect, yours, &c.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have procured in MS., from a private gentleman, the decrees of the Cortes establishing the jurisdiction of alcalde, &c. How far am I to be governed by the Spanish laws in force before the constitution, or passed since that period? If the latter, to what period are those decrees to be considered as in force: to the time of ratifying the treaty, to the present time, or until the establishment of a Government by act of Congress? These questions cannot easily be answered. The Governor here still exercised the powers of admiralty judge—in virtue of what law I know not: it was the only judicial power he did exercise since the adoption of the constitution.

CHAPTER THIRD.

Of the constitutional alcalde of towns (pueblos) or villages.

ARTICLE 1. As the alcaldes of towns exercise the office of conciliator in the same, whatever any one has a right to demand of another before the judge of the district (partido) in civil cases, or for injuries, (torts), he must present himself to the alcalde, who, with two arbitrators, (hombres buenos), to be named by each party, shall hear the parties, and the reasons they may allege; and, after the opinion of the two thus associated, shall, within eight days, at furthest, award what may appear proper for the termination of the difference, without any further proceedings. This award shall in effect, terminate the same, provided the parties be content therewith; and it shall be entered on a book to be kept by the alcalde for that purpose, to be called the conciliatory determinations, the alcalde, the arbitrators, and the parties signing the act; and to them the requisite certificate shall be given.

ART. 2. In case the parties do not agree, it shall be so entered on the same book, and the alcalde shall give to the party requesting it a certificate of the attempt at conciliation, and the failure thereof.

ART. 3. When any person residing in a different town shall be cited before the alcalde conciliator, the citation shall be made through the judge where he resides, requiring him to appear, by himself or attorney, within a reasonable time; and, not appearing, a certificate shall be given to the plaintiff, declaring that the attempt at conciliation had been made, and that it had failed through the default of the other party.

ART. 4. If the demand before the alcalde relate to the detention of the debtor's goods, when such debtor intends to withdraw them, or to the interdiction of some new work, or other matters of like urgency, and the plaintiff pray the alcalde immediately to make a provisional order, to avoid the injury from delay, the alcalde may grant the same, and shall proceed immediately to the conciliation.

ART. 5. The alcaldes shall, moreover, take cognizance, in their respective towns, of civil demands to the amount of 500 reals as in Spain, and of $100 beyond seas; and of criminal cases relating to injuries (torts) and trivial faults, which merit no higher punishment than a reprimand or slight correction; one or the other being determined merely in a verbal manner. For this purpose, in the civil demand above mentioned, and in the criminal cases relating to injuries, the alcaldes shall also associate with them two good men named by each party, and, after hearing the plaintiff and defendant, and the opinions of the persons associated, they shall give, before the clerk, such sentence as may be proper, and from which there shall be no appeal; nor will any other formality be requisite than that of entering it briefly in a book to be kept for verbal judgments; the alcalde, arbitrators, and clerk signing the same.

ART. 6. The alcaldes of towns shall also take cognizance in all suits (diligencias) of a civil nature, until they shall reach the point of litigation or dispute (el contencioso) between the parties, on which they are to be transmitted to the judge of the district, (partido.)

ART. 7. They may, in like manner, take cognizance in the first stage of such cases, which, although litigated, are of a very urgent nature, and do not afford an opportunity of resorting to the judge of the district, as the taking of inventories, the interposition to prevent the retracting in an undertaking, and the like; taking care to transmit them to the judge on the attainment of the object.

ART. 8. The alcaldes, in the case of the commission of any crime within their jurisdiction, as on finding any delinquent, should proceed officially to form the first proceedings of the examination and arrestation of the offenders, if there should appear to be any offence deserving corporal punishment; or, when apprehended flagrante delicto, they must give an account of them to the judge of the district, transmitting the proceedings to him, and placing the offenders at his disposal.

ART. 9. The alcaldes of the towns in which the district judge resides may and ought to take previous cognizance of such cases as are included in the provisions of the preceding articles, giving an account of them to the judge without delay, in order that the latter may continue the proceedings.

ART. 10. In all the suits to which the causes, civil as well as criminal, may give rise, the district judges cannot use other means to carry their judgments into execution than the alcaldes of the towns.

ART. 11. With regard to the government, economy, and police of the towns, the alcaldes will exercise the jurisdiction and powers which have heretofore been held by the ordinary alcaldes, taking always the constitution for their guide.

CHAPTER FOURTH.

Of the administration of justice in the first instance, (primera instancia,) before the formation of districts.

ARTICLE 1. Until the distribution of districts, provided for in the second chapter, be made and approved, and the letrados of the same be appointed by the Governor, all the causes and suits, both criminal and civil, will be prosecuted, in the first instance, before the letrado of royal nomination, the sub-delegates of ultramarine dominions, and the constitutional alcaldes of towns.

ART. 2. The letrados appointed by the King will be limited precisely to the exercise of jurisdiction over disputes respecting towns in which they have held it hitherto; and if in any of those towns they have exercised it previously with the alcaldes, the latter, with the letrados, will continue their authority to take cognizance of suits by anticipation.

ART. 3. In the other towns, in which there are no letrados, nor ultramarine delegates, the constitutional alcaldes will exercise the jurisdiction over disputes in the first instance, as the ordinary alcaldes have exercised it.

ART. 4. The alcaldes of the towns in which there is no letrado, nor ultramarine delegate, and in which the former have not exercised the jurisdiction previously with the latter, will take cognizance of disputes in no other cases but those mentioned in the fifth and eighth articles of chapter third.

ART. 5. The alcaldes, with an absolute inhibition of the letrados and ultramarine sub-delegates, will take cognizance of the government, economy, and police, of the respective towns.

ART. 6. The constitutional alcaldes of the towns will, forthwith, enter on the functions of conciliators, agreeably to the provisions contained in the first four articles of the same third chapter; and no demand, civil or criminal, shall be admitted, in case of injuries, without the certificate of the method of conciliation having been tried, and that the parties would not agree thereto. The regency of the kingdom is hereby notified of the same, and required to make the necessary dispositions for carrying it into effect, &c.—“1812.”

On the restoration of the constitution, these, among other laws passed under it, were revived. The powers of the viceroys and commandants, or governors, have undergone a complete change, and, without being aided by other officers and tribunals, contemplated by the new order of things, it is impossible to carry on the civil administration according to the existing frame of Government. A cessation of the administration of justice for two months would be calculated to produce great mischief. The former Government did not scruple to use force when they thought proper, and paid just as much attention to the theory of their authority as they pleased.

The foregoing is all that is to be found in relation to the only tribunal existing in West Florida for the administration of justice. The alcalde is little more than an officer appointed to introduce the parties to the tribunal capable of deciding. And this tribunal is a connected part of a chain of tribunals, from which it cannot be separated without rendering it useless and incomplete. The appointment of a judge, according to the Spanish plan, is necessary. But the exact modes of introducing and following the suit are alone calculated for an unmixed Spanish population, and to be administered by Spaniards; for they are totally at variance with all American ideas. In criminal cases, it has no power whatever to try an offender.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

His Ex'cy Major Gen. JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

PENSACOLA, July 18, 1821.

R. K. CALL, Acting Sec'y of W. F.

An ordinance prescribing the mode of carrying into effect the sixth article of the treaty of amity, settlement of differences, and limits, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty.

PENSACOLA, July 21, 1821.

By Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the provinces of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of the said provinces, respectively.

Whereas, by the sixth article of the said treaty, it is amongst other things provided that, on the entrance of the ceded territories into the Union, the inhabitants thereof shall be "admitted to the enjoyment of the privileges, rights, and immunities, of the citizens of the United States." Now, therefore, as well with a view to guard against impositions that may be practised by foreigners, as to secure to the inhabitants their free choice to become citizens, under the provisions of the said treaty:

SECTION 1. I do ordain that the mayor of the city of Pensacola, and such other persons as may be appointed for the purpose in any town or county in these provinces, shall open a register, and cause to be inscribed the name, age, and occupation of every free male inhabitant of such town or county, who may be desirous to profit by the provisions of the sixth article of the treaty as aforesaid in part recited: Provided, That the person or inhabitant who may thus desire to have his name inscribed shall first satisfy the mayor, or such other persons as may be appointed to open registers, that he was really an inhabitant of the ceded territory on the 17th day of July, 1821: And provided, also, That he will, of his own free will and accord, abjure all foreign allegiance, and take the oath of allegiance prescribed by the laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the said office of register shall continue open for and during the space of twelve months, when the same shall be closed, and a copy thereof transmitted, under the seal of the said mayor, or other persons appointed to open registers, to the secretaries of the said territories.

SEC. 3. That, from and after the period of the said register being so closed, no other free male inhabitant, above the age of twenty-one, and entitled to make his election as aforesaid, shall be, within the ceded territories, entitled to any of the rights, privileges, and immunities of a citizen of the United States, but shall, to all intents and purposes, be considered as a foreigner, and subject to the laws of the United States in relation to aliens.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the heads of families within the said provinces, being desirous to profit by this act, to furnish the mayor, or such other persons as may be appointed to open registers, with the name and age of every free male member of his family; and the said mayor shall cause the same to be inscribed on the register, as before provided for.

SEC. 5. In order to guard the more effectually against impositions, as well as to give to the inhabitants the security which citizenship will afford them abroad, it is further ordained that the secretary or secretaries of the ceded territories grant to such inhabitants as may be desirous of receiving the same certificates of citizenship, he or they being first satisfied that the provisions of this ordinance shall have been complied with.

SEC. 6. The evidence upon which the secretary or secretaries shall proceed to grant certificates of citizenship shall be, a certificate of the clerk of the mayor, or such other persons as may be appointed to open registers, that the applicant has complied with the requisitions of this ordinance; upon the receipt of which, it shall be the duty of the secretary or secretaries to grant to all and every such applicant or applicants certificates of citizenship, for which the said clerk and secretary shall be entitled to one dollar each; and, for every name entered on the register, the mayor, or other persons authorized to open the same, shall be entitled to one dollar.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By the Governor:

R. K. CALL, Act'g Sec'y of W. F.

PENSACOLA, July 21, 1821.

By Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the provinces of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the island of Cuba over the same, and of the Governor of the said provinces, respectively.

Whereas, from the extent of the ceded territories, it becomes necessary to make such divisions as will promote the convenience of the inhabitants, and the speedy execution of the laws; wherefore, and in virtue of the authority vested in me by the Government of the United States, I do ordain:

SEC. 1. That the said provinces be divided, as follows: All the country lying between the rivers Perdido and Suwanee, with all the islands therein, shall form one county, to be called Escambia; and all the country lying east of the Suwanee, and every part of the ceded territories not designated as belonging to the former county, shall form a county to be called St. John's.

SEC. 2. In each of said counties, and for the government thereof, there shall be established a court, to be designated a county court, and to be composed of five justices of the peace, any three of whom shall form a quorum; and the eldest, by appointment, to be president of said court, whose jurisdiction shall extend to all civil cases originating in the said county, where the matter in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, and to all criminal cases; saving to the parties the right of appeal to the Governor in all cases above the sum of five dollars; and that there shall be no execution for a capital offence until the warrant of the Governor be first had and obtained.

SEC. 3. That the judicial proceedings in all civil cases shall be conducted, except as to the examination of witnesses, according to the course of the existing laws, or of the laws of Spain; and in criminal cases according to the course of the common law;—that is, no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury. And in all criminal cases the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the county wherein the crime shall have been committed; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

SEC. 4. There shall be a clerk appointed for each of said county courts, who shall receive for his services such compensation as the court for which he is appointed may, from time to time, and in each suit, tax or allow. And there shall also be a sheriff appointed to each county, to execute the process thereof, whose services shall be compensated by the court to which he is appointed, in like manner as is provided for the clerk. And the said clerk and sheriff shall give bond to the presiding justice for the faithful discharge of their duties.

SEC. 5. Each county court shall hold quarterly sessions, and continue the same until all the business pending therein shall be disposed of. The first session to be held at Pensacola on the first Monday of August next, for the county of Escambia; and at St. Augustine on the second Monday of September next, for the county of St. John; with power to adjourn from time to time.

SEC. 6. There shall not be less than ten justices of the peace commissioned for each county, whose jurisdiction shall extend to all cases not exceeding fifty dollars, saving to the parties or suitors an appeal to the county court in all cases wherein the matter in dispute shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars; and shall also be authorized in all criminal cases to exact surety for good behaviour, and to take recognizances, in cases bailable, for the appearance of the accused before the county courts.

SEC. 7. That the examination of all witnesses within the jurisdiction of the courts, except where their personal attendance cannot be procured, shall be conducted viva voce, and in open court; that the parties may conduct their suits in person, or by such counsel as they may choose: Provided, That the said counsel or counsellors shall have been duly licensed to practice in the courts of the said ceded territories by the Governor.

SEC. 8. The alcaldes shall continue to exercise the power of judges of probate, registers of wills, notaries public, and of justices of the peace, and such other powers appertaining to the said offices as have not been otherwise distributed; saving a right to appeal to the county courts in all cases.

SEC. 9. That the judges of the said county courts shall have power to impose such taxes upon the inhabitants of their counties, respectively, as, in their discretion, may be necessary to meet and defray the expenses which may be incurred in carrying this ordinance into effect.

SEC. 10. That the said county courts shall have and exercise the power of directing, by special venire, or otherwise, the summoning of all jurors, grand as well as petit.

SEC. 11. That the said courts shall have the power of creating and regulating their process and proceedings, from time to time, as they may deem necessary; and shall, as soon as convenient after their organization, prepare and report a fee-bill to the Governor for his approbation.

SEC. 12. That the said courts shall have and exercise the power, beyond the limits of Pensacola and St. Augustine, of granting and recalling licenses and commissions for innkeepers, retailers of liquors of every description, and keepers of billiard tables; and to require of them such surety as they may deem proper, and impose such price for each license as, in their opinion, may be reasonable.

SEC. 13. That it shall be the duty of said courts, in regulating their process and proceedings, to confine the parties strictly to the merits of their cause; and to cause all useless matter, as well as unnecessary form, to be expunged from the pleadings, at the expense of the party introducing the same, so that justice may be administered in the most simple, cheap, and speedy manner.

SEC. 14. In all criminal cases, the process and indictment shall be in the name of the United States; and there shall be appointed a prosecuting attorney for each of the said counties, who shall receive, in each case, a reasonable compensation, to be taxed by the court.

SEC. 15. That the police of the roads and bridges, without the limits of Pensacola and St. Augustine shall be under the immediate direction of the said county courts; the police of the cities to be exclusively confided to the mayor and aldermen.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA.*

SIR: I have the pleasure to inform you that Colonel Butler reported to me his arrival here on the 8th instant, and that he had, on the 10th ultimo, agreeably to my instructions, received possession of East Florida and its dependencies, and that he had forwarded to you a full report of all his proceedings as commissioner for receiving possession of the same. You will find, from my instructions to him, that I had communicated to him the agreement with Don Jose Callava respecting the ordnance claimed by him as not appendages to the fortifications, and also as to the provisions and transportation of the civil officers; and the transportation of the families and servants of both the civil and military officers, all of which was well understood by the Spanish Governor and myself here, and which has been arranged, agreeably to my instructions, by and between Colonel Butler and Governor Coppinger, in the delivery of East Florida, and referred for a decision to our respective Governments.

I am happy to find that Colonel Butler has conducted himself in this whole transaction with his usual ability and prudence, and which I hope will meet with the approbation of the Government. Colonel Butler reports further to me that, before he left St. Augustine, he was confidently informed that Governor Coppinger, in the last six months, had been issuing grants. New grants are daily appearing here for lots laid out in the public square of the city of Pensacola, sold by Governor Mazot. Seeing this, I thought it my duty to order that no improvements should be erected in the public square until these rights were decided upon by our Government. Many of these lots have been enclosed—a circumstance injurious to both the health and beauty of the town, and to those who have heretofore purchased, as was believed, fronting the square.

There are many and flagrant frauds committed and committing with regard to grants for land; and it is believed that the reason why the archives were not delivered to our agent at the Havana, agreeably to the treaty, was to enable Don Victor Pintado, surveyor general of West Florida, and said to be of very loose morals, to fabricate certificates and grants to any that would pay him for it, and to keep secreted the old records that might lead to a discovery of the frauds. Since 1818, John Innerarity has obtained, as I am informed, two grants for ninety thousand arpents of land, located on the trace which I made in marching my troops from the Appalachicola to Pensacola in the year 1818, and on each side of said trace, and I am informed the grants bear date in 1817. There is now sufficient proof that these grants are antedated, if there were any tribunal legally to investigate them. I have again to suggest to the Government the necessity and propriety of appointing commissioners for the adjudication of the land claims in the Floridas, who should be men of good information, great integrity, and energy of character, or great frauds will be imposed upon our Government, and no land will be left by which to raise funds to meet the demands guarantied by the treaty to be paid to our citizens for spoiliations committed by Spain. It behooves Congress to pass a law that will enable these commissioners to detect the many frauds that will be attempted.

My report will give you full information of the perfidy attempted to be practised upon me by the barefaced violation of the pledge and agreement of Don Jose Callava, which will, I trust, recoil upon himself and nation. I was well apprized of Spanish treachery and duplicity; but it is to be regretted that, although my quartermaster was frequently advised to beware of them, he could not believe that any man whose shoulders were adorned with epaulettes could be so base.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th June, in answer to mine of the 24th April, and the 1st, 7th, 19th, and 30th of May. I have only to observe, that Major Stanton chartered the transports with drafts drew by me on you, and that his duplicate receipt was enclosed to you under cover of my letter of the 16th day of July last. Colonel Butler's arrival will put it in my power to make up my accounts to the 1st of August, a duplicate of which I will forward by mail to you, and in due time will send on the account and vouchers by Dr. Bronaugh; when I will endeavor to send on a further report of the state of this country and East Florida, with all other information that I may conceive it necessary for my Government to be informed of.

I closed the organization of the civil government here on the 27th ultimo, and on the 28th despatched an express to St. Augustine with the ordinances I thought it necessary to adopt. I found nothing here but an alcalde, who was a half-pay officer, and who could not retain the office without resigning his Spanish military commission, and taking the necessary oath of office under our Government. This he refused to do; and I prevailed upon Judge Brackenridge to accept this appointment. He has given great satisfaction to all, and particularly to the Spanish population of this place; and I can, with truth, say that as much order at present prevails in Pensacola as I ever saw in any town.

My health has not been good; my labors have been arduous; and my exposure to the heat in camp for some days very injurious to my constitution; but I hope a little leisure will restore me.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

P. S. I herewith enclose to you the instructions I had forwarded by Colonel Gadsden to Colonel Butler, which reached him but a few hours before the delivery of East Florida, and after the Colonel had closed his arrangements with Governor Coppinger; but I think it necessary to forward them, to show you at that early day the full understanding between Governor Callava and myself on the subject of the ordinance and the provisions, &c., &c., &c., furnished by me, and to be referred to our respective Governments.

Yours, respectfully,

A. J.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

PENSACOLA, October 6, 1821.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 20th of August last, in answer to my several letters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th of July; which, you are pleased to inform me, you have transmitted to the President of the United States at Shannondale springs.

You request me to communicate to you, as early as possible, and as fully as may be in my power, such information as may serve to enlighten the inquiries of Congress on the different subjects which will require the attention of that body, in relation to the Floridas, at their next session.

After giving this important subject the attention which it merits, and referring to the various laws which you have been pleased to notice in your letter, I proceed to lay before you such information as I have been able to collect, and as I conceive to be within the scope of your inquiries, together with such reflections as suggest themselves to my mind.

As a subject of the first importance at the present juncture, I must refer you to my letter to the Secretary of War of the 17th instant. You will find, from that communication, that the Indians are spread over the whole of East, and part of West Florida. From the talk I have had with some of their chiefs, who visited me some time ago, and forwarded with the letter just mentioned, the places at present occupied by them have been ascertained with tolerable accuracy; that is, as far as the wandering habits of these people will permit them to be considered as occupying any place. For the greater part, these Indians consist of those who fled from the Upper Creeks in 1814, and, adhering to our enemies, continued at war with us until subdued in 1818; since which time they have remained in the Floridas. I am clearly of opinion that they ought to be ordered up to their old places of abode within the Creek nation, as they can have no rightful claim to lands or country within the Floridas. As to those who have been born and raised within the Floridas, it is absolutely necessary that they should be collected at one point, and secured in their settlements by act of Congress, in case they cannot be prevailed upon to unite with the Creek nation, to which they originally belonged: this latter course is very desirable for their own safety, as well as dictated to us by sound policy. They might be then completely protected by our Government; they may be provided for by annuity, or by such other mode as Congress, in their wisdom, may devise, adequate to their wants, and to induce them to embrace an agricultural life. Should the Indians prefer continuing within the Floridas, it will be expedient, for the safety of our frontier on the seacoast, to concentrate them on the Appalachicola river, immediately adjoining the southern boundary of Georgia and Alabama, on both sides of the river, and downward, so as to include a sufficient area for them. By this means, a sufficient white population may be interposed between them and the seaboard, and afford a settlement strong enough to cover and protect St. Augustine and Pensacola, as well as the peninsula of Florida.

By referring to the talk already mentioned, you will see that the difficulty of collecting the native Indians of the Floridas to the point on the Appalachicola will not be great. They are rejoiced to hear that a country will be allowed them to live in at all—such have been their apprehensions of their future fate since the transfer of their country to the United States, excited, no doubt, by mischievous advisers; and they will be still more so to find that they will be fostered and protected by the American Government. I have been long impressed with the absurdity of entering into treaties with the Indian tribes residing within our territorial limits, subject to our jurisdiction, and to such laws as Congress may pass for their security, happiness, and safety. I therefore respectfully recommend to the consideration of the President, whether it will not be proper to suggest to Congress the propriety of laying off a tract of country for them, and fixing a boundary between them and the settlement of the whites. It is well known to me, from experience and observation, that more general justice can be done the Indians by the legislative provisions of Congress than by treaties; the poor can be better taken care of, and more equal justice done the whole. I have constantly observed that, in Indian treaties, the chiefs are fattened, and the common Indians left to starve. Another, and a very important reason for adopting the policy I have recommended is, the great obstacle which will otherwise exist to the surveying and bringing the public lands into market; which, I presume, is intended to be done as speedily as possible.

The next subject which presents itself is the form of Territorial government proper to be adopted for the Floridas. This must be, in a great measure, adapted to the geographical form and to the character of the soils. The principal body of land capable of supporting a considerable population lies nearly east and west from the Choctawhatchie to the Alachua and St. John's, being about thirty miles in width by about three hundred in length, and partly in East, and partly in West Florida. The peninsula has been very little explored; but, from the best information I can obtain, I am inclined to think that, excepting immediately on the margin of the river St. John's, there is no extensive body of good land in any part of it, although it is possible that some good soil may be found in small quantities, in particular places; with these exceptions, the Floridas consist of pine woods and swamps. If the lower part of the peninsula were not, as I believe it to be, capable of supporting only a small population, the geographical shape of the Floridas would be extremely inconvenient; but as it is, there will only be a disproportion between the length and breadth, but not such as to render it unfit for our territorial government. Pensacola is at one of these extremes, and St. Augustine at the other. The centre of the future population of the Floridas will be somewhere about the Suwanee, which is a fine river, and flows through a country of good land. The Okefonoco swamp, represented on the maps as near the heads of this river and of the Wachulla and St. Mark's, has no real existence, as was ascertained by me in 1818, when I marched through the country, and found the swamp, as represented, to be the Mickasuky pond, or lake, in the midst of a very healthy, fertile country, and which has been settling very rapidly. It may be well to observe, that the present maps only tend to deceive and mislead. Before Congress can enter upon the subject of a separation of the Floridas into two territories, the question of the location of the Indians must be settled. If they be concentrated at the point proposed, I would recommend that the Floridas be made but one territory; and I feel perfectly satisfied that, with such an arrangement, two or three years would give a sufficient population to the Floridas to form a State Government. Should a separation take place, this object will be long deferred, if not entirely defeated, and may produce the necessity of uniting West Florida to Alabama; which, if done, will, of course, occasion the annexation of East Florida to Georgia. The whole, if no subdivision take place, will, in a few years, constitute one of the most respectable States in this part of the Union; will exceed Louisiana in population, and rival it in wealth; but, if separated into two territories, the population of neither will suffice.

As far as I have been able to ascertain the wishes of the people of West Florida, they appear to be against the annexation to Alabama; and, from what I can learn, the same sentiment prevails in East Florida with respect to Georgia. The best interest of the Floridas, in my opinion, requires that they should be united under one territorial government, with an eye to their speedy admission into the Union as a State; by this means, a great saving will be made to the United States in [not] maintaining two distinct territorial governments for an uncertain period of time. The vicinity of the Suwanee river possesses many advantages for the location of the seat of government; it is equally central to the country east of the St. John's the Escambia, and Florida Point, over and above the advantages of being situated in the centre of a beautiful limestone country.

I am of opinion, taking into view the mixed population likely to exist here for some time, that the form of the territorial government ought to be simple and energetic. The territorial organization, in the first grade of government, adopted for the Louisiana Territory, with some alterations to suit local circumstances, may answer the purpose. The Spanish population forming but a small proportion, it is of very little importance to preserve any of their ancient laws and customs; the sooner they become American, the better.

The lands and the land titles of the Floridas require the most serious attention of Congress. It is a subject of the greatest importance to the Government, and ought to receive the earliest consideration. Whilst the honest grantee may be protected in his rights, the greatest pains should be taken to exclude the numerous fraudulent and antedated claims, founded on no possession at the time of issuing the grant or concession, and without any original record or survey in West Florida that has yet been discovered. Nearly all these grants commence in 1817, by petition to the Governor for an order of survey or location; and in every instance the other parts of the title are completed from 1818 to 1824. For some years past, from all I can learn, this has been a trading business with the officers of the Spanish Government, both here and at St. Augustine; the stranger was accosted in the streets, and offered a grant for a doubloon, or some trifle. The petition only has the appearance of being original, but in most instances, in all probability, antedated; the other documents attached to it are only certified copies from the archives in the keeping of Pintado, the surveyor general at Havana, and who is even now making out official certificates of those papers to be evidence here—a kind of impudence and imposture at which Congress will no doubt be indignant. Before the year 1817 there was scarcely any such thing as a grant of land, excepting in the immediate vicinity of this place; and I presume that, in East Florida, the number was also very inconsiderable. They were made, I believe, merely with a view to the change of governments, and with no intention of settling. A provision similar to that contained in the 14th section of the act of the 20th December, 1803, declaring all incomplete grants not commenced before 1816, and not accompanied by settlement, as null and void, would at once put an end to the whole of the fraudulent grants. As to the enormous grants in different parts of the Floridas it is not necessary for me to speak; but I am pretty certain that, if all are sanctioned, it will take a country twice as large as the Floridas to gratify them. The extract of a letter from Mr. Brown, a gentleman of respectability from Baltimore, herewith enclosed, will show that a grant has been made since the 24th of January, 1818, by the Captain General of Cuba, to Arredondo, for a large tract in the Alachua plains, and which I have every reason to believe is fraudulent. I would, therefore, recommend that Congress should declare void all grants for land not founded on actual possession before the 22d February, 1816; and, in like manner, declaring void all grants not bottomed on a concession regularly made agreeably to the Spanish law, and possession taken and continued, and improvements made thereon, in strict conformity to the Spanish regulation; making such exceptions as will secure his settlement, &c., to the individual who shall have had five years' continued possession prior to the 24th day of January, 1818. In referring to the numerous acts of Congress for the adjustment of the land titles in the different Territories, I find very little that is applicable at present to the Floridas, excepting the act of the 21st April, 1806; the first section of which defines that no grant shall be valid unless founded on possession, commencing with and continued under the concession by the proper officer of Spain. The greatest difficulty appears to be in the establishment of a board of commissioners. A great variety of plans have been fallen upon. The first, consisting of three commissioners, secretary, register, and recorder, was found too expensive and dilatory; the last, adopted for the country east of the Mississippi, was too simple and too cheap; two districts were formed, and a single commissioner appointed to each, with a clerk, who was expected to discharge all the functions of recorder and translator. This may have answered a very good purpose in Mississippi and Alabama, but much more difficult and important legal questions will arise here; and I do not hesitate to say, that the commissioners for the settlement of the land titles ought to be men of the first legal talents, of strict integrity, and, I would add, as an essential requisite, possessing no landed interest in the Floridas. Persons will be recommended from this place who ought not to be appointed. There are but few titles which are clear of dispute; and where a man has bought a title under disputed circumstances, it is very natural that self-interest, and the interest of his friends, will have great weight in his mind, and precedents will be established to insure their validity. I do not go too far when I say that no person should be appointed who has bought a land claim in the Floridas. It cannot be too strongly impressed on the mind of the President, that men of talents and strict integrity, who have no interest in landed property in the Floridas, should be selected as commissioners to settle the land titles.

It is of great importance, that the judiciary should be filled by men of first rate legal talents and unimpeached integrity, as much will depend upon those who are employed to lay the foundation of any system. Respectability will be given to the Government by appointing men possessing weight of character; they ought to be well acquainted with the civil law, and the maritime law, as well as the common law. The same court might have chancery powers given to it, on the plan of the circuit courts of the United States, and I think ought to be required to hold its terms more frequently than has been usual, or to hold adjourned courts from time to time, as business may require. I consider the judiciary as by far the most important branch of the territorial government: persons should be selected whose unexceptionable character will be a pledge that they will steer clear of the influence of corruption of any kind, or of partiality. To the high character of the distributors of justice from the bench will be attached that confidence, so indispensable in all well-regulated governments. It is the purity of this branch of the administration which secures to the citizen the peaceful enjoyment of his constitutional rights and privileges, and awards a speedy punishment to those who violate the law and trample upon the rights of others.

I forward you printed copies of the ordinances, as they may perhaps contain some things deserving of being permanently incorporated in the act of Congress organizing the territorial government.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, &c.

P. S. I am just on the eve of departure for my residence in Tennessee, and will necessarily be absent from this Territory some time, but will make such arrangements as will enable me to return on the shortest notice, in case any thing should occur to render my presence necessary. W. G. D. Worthington, Esq., and Colonel George Walton, are respectively charged with the powers formerly exercised by the Governors of East and West Florida. I enclose a copy of an address (in a newspaper) to the inhabitants of the Floridas, which I thought proper to publish previous to my leaving the country.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

PENSACOLA, Sept. 17, 1821.

SIR: By last mail I received, enclosed to me by Captain Bell, commanding and executing the civil government at St. Augustine, the unauthorized talk held by Horatio Dexter and Mr. Wanton with what they are pleased to call the King of the Seminoles, and fifty-four of the Indians present. It appears that this talk with the Seminoles has been forwarded to some of the Departments, (whether to you, is not mentioned;) and were it not for its novelty, and the object, which appears obvious, I should not have troubled you with the transmission of such a paper, or with any comments upon it. The object of this unauthorized proceeding appears to me evidently to be, first, on the part of Dexter and Wanton, to obtrude themselves on the notice of the Government; and, secondly, to impress on the minds of the Indians their absolute right to the country. I have written to Mr. Worthington to seize these self-made Indian agents, and detain them until the instructions of the Government can be had. And this talk proves the necessity of Congress taking the subject up, and by law prescribing bounds to the Seminoles.

The exposed situation of the Floridas imperiously demands that their frontier upon the coast (if it may be so expressed) should be immediately inhabited by our white citizens. The Indians, at present, are scattered from Florida point to the Choctawhatchie. If you attempt to concentrate or consolidate them at the Mickasuky pond, or Old Towns, you offend those that are situated on the Suwanee, in the Alachua plains, or on the peninsula. As they have been continually at war with the United States, until conquered in the Spring of 1818, when they were ordered up above the Florida line, where the nation to which they originally belonged was willing to receive them, such a measure would reconcile all. This is what they expected, and what good policy and the safety of the Georgia frontier required. But this is what these unauthorized Indian agents, who offer their services to both parties, as I conceive, wish to prevent, and on which the Government ought seriously to reflect. The Government cannot turn the torrent of emigration to the Floridas without great expense; good policy and the safety of the frontier, in my opinion, require that the Government should promote emigration to this country, and hasten its admission as a State into the Union.

If the Indians be removed within the limits of the country assigned to the Creek nation, (of which the Seminoles are a part,) this object, on which the security of the southern borders so much depends, will be speedily attained. With what pretence of justice can those who fled from the Creek nation, and kept up an exterminating war on our frontier, until crushed by the arm of our Government in 1818, set up such claims? And is the safety of our frontier to be jeopardized by the complaints of a few Indians, excited by would-be Indian agents, and Indian treaty-makers, who compose flowery talks for them, and put words into their mouths they never conceived; and make Indian chiefs to suit their own views, and who were never heard of as such before? The greater part of the Indians now in the Floridas consist of those who fled in the manner already mentioned; and why should we hesitate to order them up at once, when the Executive Government, with the aid of Congress, can do ample justice by law, if necessary, to those who deserve it, by giving such equivalent as will enable them to settle their families in the upper country, and to cultivate their farms? Unless the Indians be consolidated at one point, where is the country that can be brought into market, from which the five millions are to be raised to meet the claims of our citizens under the late treaty with Spain?

I received, by last mail, a letter from Mr. Perrieres of the 14th May last, and another of the 10th of July. By the latter, he informs me he is about to proceed to the Havana, to inquire whether any treaties have been made with the Indians by Spain. Whether this be in pursuance of instructions from you, I am not advised; but surely the Government of the United States is competent to regulate the concerns of these Indians, and mete to them every justice to which they are entitled, and to make such regulations as the safety of the frontier may require, without reference to any treaty with Spain; and particularly when it is notorious that the greater part of those Indians, as already observed, fled from the Creek nation in 1813 and 1814, adhered to our enemies, and continued their warfare under the excitement of British agents and Spanish incendiaries, until the United States, from self-defence, were compelled to chastise and conquer them.

I have made inquiries for a proper character duly qualified to act as interpreter for Mr. Perrieres. It requires, as Mr. Perrieres does not speak English, that that interpreter should speak the English, Indian, and French languages. Such a one is difficult to be found; in short, I can hear of none but Mr. Hambly, and for him I have sent; but am informed he is with the Creek agent. I advised you in my last that the indisposition of Mrs. J. would compel me to travel with her, as soon as her health would permit, out of this southern climate; and this would prevent me from holding a treaty with the Indians; although, to speak candidly, I am determined never to be concerned in another. I do think it not only useless, but absurd, when Congress have the power to regulate all Indian concerns by act of Congress, and the arm of the Government is sufficiently strong to carry such regulations into effect. More general justice can be done to the Indians in this way than by treaty. When the policy of treating with the Indians was first adopted, it was at a time when we found them thrown upon our hands by the treaty of 1783, without any provision being made for them; and at that time they were numerous and hostile, while the arm of the Government was too weak to enforce such regulations as justice and good policy required; hence the necessity of managing them by treaties. But this has passed away; the arm of Government is sufficient to protect them, and to carry into execution any measures called for by justice to them, or by the safety of our borders. Hence the absurdity of holding treaties with Indian tribes within our territorial limits, subject to our sovereignty and municipal regulations, and to whom, by legislation, every justice can be done, and the safety of our southern frontier perfectly secured.

These were some of the reasons that weighed upon my mind for addressing the Government on this subject the last Spring, in hopes that I would be authorized by the Executive to have carried into full effect the orders I had given them in 1818, and which had been given after consulting the chiefs of the Creek nation, and finding it to be their wish and that they were willing to receive them. At that time many of them went up, and, I am informed, are now living happily there. I pray you to look at the map of the Floridas, and you will at one glance see that to locate them in the Floridas will greatly weaken your frontier, when, by removing them, you clear the southern borders of all Indians.

Since writing the foregoing, I have made inquiry respecting Dexter and Wanton, and am informed by a gentleman on whom, from his character and standing in society, every reliance can be placed, that those persons are profligate characters, and are and have been engaged in forming a settlement in the Alachua plains, under the grant of the Duke de Alagon, and it is said have obtained a grant from the Indians, by deed duly executed before witnesses, relinquishing to them all Indian claim to a large tract of country. From the bare reading of Dexter's letter, and the Indian talk, I was impressed with a belief that Messrs. Dexter and Wanton were just such characters as above described, and in whom no confidence ought to be placed, and who ought, as I have directed, to be sent beyond the Floridas. Nothing more clearly proves the imperious necessity of ordering those deluded Indians to the upper country, where they can be protected and made happy by the bounty and humanity of our Government. I am, sir, &c. A. JACKSON.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN.

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 14, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the 7th instant, the acting collector of this port seized the English schooner Oliander, Thomas Crowder, master, from Nassau, which had entered this port in violation of the navigation laws of the United States; having on board a quantity of salt, and four negroes registered as slaves, and shipped as seamen, in addition to two white men—a number too great for so small a vessel. The slaves are held in safe-keeping within the fort, and the circumstances reported to the Secretary of the Treasury.

On the 9th instant, J. S. Beers, Esq. exhibited to me his letter of appointment as postmaster for this place, and informed me that he had complied with the conditions, by giving bonds. He has entered upon the duties of his office, and the mail is carried by contract from this to St. Mary's, once a week, by the General Government.

On the 11th instant, J. Rodman, Esq., appointed collector of this port and district by the President of the United States, arrived, and produced satisfactory evidence of his appointment, and, having executed the necessary bonds, has commenced the discharge of his official duties. On the same evening, we were informed that Mr. Worthington, secretary of this province, had sailed, with his family, from Charleston, bound for this place, on the 5th instant. On the 9th, a vessel was seen off the harbor, which, from the wind blowing heavy at the time, was not able to enter the harbor, and passed off to the south. We are daily expecting him. Yesterday, Captain Hanham arrived, bearer of despatches from your Excellency to Mr. Worthington, which are in my possession; and, as all persons in the province appear to be reconciled to the powers that be, I have thought proper not to promulgate the system of organization of civil and judicial officers directed to be carried into effect, as it will be better done by Mr. Worthington, and have a better effect, for from new officers new regulations will be expected. The commission for Mr. Forbes remains, for the same reason.

I enclose for your information a copy of a letter from Mr. Dexter, accompanied by a talk held with the Seminoles, who are, at this time, in a state of great uncertainty of what will be the course Government will pursue towards them. A person qualified and acquainted with the Indian character could make any reasonable terms with them; but, if there should be much greater delay, there will be a war between them and the Creeks; which, if sanctioned by Government, must end in the extermination of the Seminoles, or will drive them to great excesses on the inhabitants here; and will prevent, during the time, any white person from travelling in the interior of the country. They have already turned back persons who were going to survey lands. The sub-agent is of no use to them or the Government, from a want of knowledge of Indian character, and the policy of our Government towards them. Our troops are healthy.

Transactions in Florida—General Jackson.

Most respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
JNO. R. BELL,

Capt. Com'g and Prov'l Sec'y of E. F.

Maj. Gen. ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas.

ST. AUGUSTINE, August 12, 1821.

SIR: The enclosed is transcribed from a pencil copy, accidentally retained for my private satisfaction, and may, possibly, deviate slightly in language from the original, placed in the hands of a friend in South Carolina to be transmitted to the proper department, and which, I hope, has long since reached its destination.

I have been extremely free and unreserved in my communication to you on this subject; and if my long acquaintance with and residence among the Indians, and the confidence they repose in me, can be useful to your Government, I trust it is needless to add that you may command my services in any manner, or to any extent. I do not assume too much in undertaking the same for Mr. Wanton. I am, &c.

HORATIO S. DEXTER.

Capt. JNO. R. BELL,
Com'g and Prov'l Sec'y of E. F.

BROTHERS: We have assembled to consult upon our situation with regard to our new brothers. We have heard that the King of Spain has sold all Florida to the Americans, and that the country of the Seminoles is included in the sale. Scarcely two years have passed away since we were informed that the whole of the same country was sold by the King of Spain to three of his warriors. Brothers, how is this? The King first sells a country to one man, and then sells the same to another; and, in both cases, without the consent of the real proprietors and inhabitants. The whole of this is a mystery to us, which we cannot understand. However, we are a foolish people, and look to you for an explanation of these things; and we ask you to tell us which sale will be good, (with our consent,) or if the King can sell our country as often as he pleases, without our consent? For more than a hundred summers has the Seminole warrior reposed in the cool shade of his live oak. The sun of a hundred winters has risen upon his ardent chase of the bear and deer; and no one has questioned his right, or disputed his range. How, then, can the Spaniards sell the country which they never dared to tread without our leave? We have a treaty, now in force, made with the English in the days of Governor Tonyng, by which we relinquished to them the country east of St. John's and the head of the St. Mary's and north of the Mosquito. This is all the English ever claimed, or all the Spaniards or Americans ever could claim, according to our notions of justice. Brothers: we wish you to tell us whether the King of Spain has sold to the Americans our cattle and negroes, as well as our lands? Brothers: we wish you to tell us whether the big man, the father of the American people, is determined to deprive us of our lands, and give them to his own children? We have heard that he is a great warrior, and a good man, and would not suffer the King of Spain to sell America to another people. How, then, can he suppose we ought to submit to such an injury? The Great Spirit, the master of breath, gave one country to the Spaniards, another to the Americans, and another to us; we ought all to respect each other's rights, though our customs be different, and smoke the pipe in peace with each other. The Americans live in towns, where more than a thousand people run about, in a great hurry, over a small piece of land. The Seminole is of a wild and scattered race, that swims rivers, runs and jumps over logs, with the rifle in his hand, in pursuit of food—the whooping crane that builds its nest at night far from the spot where it dashed the dew from the grass and the flower in the morning. The Great Spirit is the author of this difference, and has given to the one as good a title to his hunting grounds as he has to the others their towns.

We cannot understand how the King, on the other side of the big water, can sell our country; or a big man, on this side, purchase it without our consent. As for your rights among us, in land, negroes, and cattle, they shall always be respected; but we wish you to understand we are desirous of living in quiet possession of our lands, and in peace with our new brothers, the Americans; and we think they ought to have the lands east of St. John's to the Spring Garden, and from the Mosquito north, but nothing more. The whole country was ours long ago, and we have parted only with a small portion. Brothers: we wish you to explain these things, and tell us how we shall act in the present circumstance; and hope the Americans will not treat us as the Spaniards have done; and inform us, also, when Captain Jackson will be here.

Reply of E. Wanton and H. S. Dexter.

We have listened to your talk with great patience, and will explain to you our thoughts on the subject, from an open heart and single tongue. The story you have heard is no lie. The Spanish King has twice sold your country: first, as you have long since been informed, to three of his warriors; and, lately, to the big man at Washington. As to the mode and manner the sale was effected, in both cases it was by signing the words "El Rey" on the corner of a sheet of paper. Which of these transactions may be the best, we do not pretend to judge. That both parties received titles from the King of Spain, is very well ascertained; and that both will make the most of their bargain, there is very little reason to doubt. It will be, therefore, necessary, if you desire to retain your lands, to take measures immediately. The great man at Washington, the President of the United States, was, probably, not well informed of your rights when he purchased Florida from the Spaniards; and, if they told him a lie, and made him believe they owned your lands, he may still change his opinion, and do you justice at the last. We advise you to send a talk to him; let it be a talk of peace; setting forth your rights, and showing your desire to live on good terms with the Americans. We advise you, also, to appoint some intelligent and faithful white man to represent your rights, and convey your wishes to the President. Should the President still not yield to the justice of your claims, but desire your lands, he will then either offer you a sum of money or land elsewhere. He may also consent to put his mark, with a pen, to paper, recognising your boundary lines established by Governor Tonyng, or some other boundary. The President has not purchased your negroes and cattle; do not give credit to such a story; it originates in a plan to cheat your people out of their property. We suppose that Captain Jackson will be in St. Augustine in about two moons; but his arrival ought not to give you uneasiness, as, we suppose, he means not to injure you. It is not in our power to inform you of the policy our father at Washington intends to pursue towards the Seminoles. We ought, however, to expect every thing favorable from a great Government, professing to act upon just principles, and motives friendly to the red people.

We, however, advise you to make known your rights and wishes to the President, and propose to settle all your differences by a treaty. In this business we will cheerfully give you all the assistance in our power.

Answer.

BROTHERS: We have listened to your talk, and approve of your advice. You have always told us the truth, and, therefore, we rely on your opinion. We give you the power to send a talk to the big man at Washington; and, also, to make a treaty with him, or appoint a good man to do so. Let it, however, be understood that we do not wish to dispose of our country, nor to be transported among strange tribes of Indians who may injure us.

The above is a talk delivered to E. Wanton and Horatio S. Dexter, on the 24th May, 1821, by Miconopy, king of the Seminole Indians, commonly called the Pond Governor; with the answer of E. Wanton and H. S. Dexter to the same. Fifty-four of the principal Indians present.
